ARMENIA'S ONLY HOPE.  Fang in All Else, its People Now Think of Leaving Their Native Land Forever —The Porte's Attitude Uncertain—Who Will be the Armenian Moses?

RETURNING Summer has brought little hope to the Armenians. All the news from that unhappy country indicates that, while there has been no recent renewal of the great massacres, the Turkish and Kurdish policy of plunder and persecution goes on unceasingly. Numbers of the exiles who attempted to return to their villages have been killed; bands of Kurds continue to rob the frightened peasants in all of the villages, and in the towns and cities, the tension between Moslem and Christian is so strained that an outbreak is momentarily feared. Sick at heart, faint from their prolonged suffering and the deprivation of many of the necessities of life and with the gloomiest forebodings as to the future, the Armenians do not know what way to turn. So widespread has been the desolation of property that to raise crops this summer is, in very many districts, well-nigh impossible. Dwellings, barns, tools, horses, cattle, are destroyed or stolen. It is a land in ruins; in some places nothing has been left that can be utilized. And the American missionaries—who write from a knowledge born of long years of experience in Armenia—candidly admit in their letters that, despite all that has been done in the way of relief, there is no more hope for the people now than there was in midwinter.

Emigration is now generally conceded to be the only hope of the Armenian people. This view is entertained and very strongly advocated by the missionaries at many of the American Board Mission stations. These godly men and women for months have been engaged in the work of distributing relief funds and are unquestionably in the best position to judge the popular feeling. During the recent troubles, many persons crossed the border into Persia and Russia, notwithstanding the prohibitory laws, which forbid the subjects of the Sultan leaving the country, unless with the consent of the government. Lately, however, as we are now advised by letters from Armenia, the policy of the government has been changed in this respect, and it is said passports are freely granted to Armenians desiring to leave the country. Whether this change of policy would continue, were the emigration to assume large proportions, is doubtful, but steps have already been taken by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD to ascertain to what extent such emigration would be permitted by the Turkish government. Should the conditions be favorable, it is not improbable that long before the million Armenian Christians, of whom a large proportion would be quick to seize any opportunity to leave the land of their fathers and escape from the cruel Moslem oppression that has trodden them under foot for centuries. Who is to be the Moses to lead this persecuted people to a land of freedom and liberty? Even if Turkey consented that they should go, it would require a vast at first appear. Those in the districts to the north and east could cross to Persia and Russia. In both these countries, Armenians are prosperous and honored. Those in the southern and western sections might find their way to the island of Cyprus, where 200,000 Armenians could be accommodated, and where they would doubtless be safe, under British protection. Still others, perhaps in considerable numbers, would find their way to England and the United States. Already the emigration project is being seriously considered by the various organizations in this country that have been most active in the work of Armenian relief. The American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions, the National Armenian Relief Association, and leading Armenians in different parts of the Union have discussed the project in its various bearings, although no definite plan of action has yet been reached. It is believed that such Armenians as come to America would be warmly welcomed, as they are known to be industrious, peaceable, and law-abiding. Letters have been received from many readers of this journal urging the advocacy of such a scheme as a means of permanent relief for the Armenians, some of the writers even pledging themselves to aid Armenian families who may come to the Southern or Western States, and to set aside land which they may cultivate for self-support. At present, it is impossible to accept any of those generous offers. Meanwhile, the progress and development of any plans for Armenian emigration will be watched with interest by a sympathetic American public.

Relief work still goes on at all the principal stations without serious interruption. Miss Kimball's summary of her work shows 19,230 persons relieved during the month of March, 10,867 being permanent beneficiaries on the list of the Industrial Department and the Bakeries. Of this large number very few are expected to be self-supporting for a long time to come. The condition of the remote villages is very distressing; their people cannot return to their lands, nor find work nor a means of living. Unless they emigrate, there would seem to be nothing ahead save starvation.

In forwarding the report of her relief work in Van up to April 1, Miss Kimball writes:

"The whole question of safety to the villages, with all it involves for the future, is even more uncertain than it was a month ago; and the tendency is to believe that life in the villages will be impossible for Christians. Should this be the case, their fall sowing of wheat—now in fine condition and prom-close of the present summer, the exodus from Armenia may have begun in earnest. It is estimated that there are in the disturbed districts over three quarters of a amount of money to transport them any considerable distance. But there are several available avenues of egress, that might make the exodus less difficult than would

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

BAD COMPANY.

Text: Prov. 1: 15, "Walk not thou in the way with them."

HARDLY any young man goes to a place of dissipation alone. Each one is accompanied. No man goes to ruin alone. He always takes someone else with him. "May it please the court," said a convicted criminal, when asked if he had anything to say before sentence of death was passed upon him—"may it please the court, bad company has been my ruin. I received the blessing of good parents, and, in return, promised to avoid all evil associations. Had I kept my promise, I should have been saved this shame, and been free from the load of guilt that hangs around me like a vulture, threatening to drag me to justice for crimes yet unrevealed. I, who once moved in the first circles of society, and have been the guest of distinguished public men, am lost, and all through bad company."

This is but one of the thousand proofs that evil associations blast and destroy. It is the invariable rule. There is a well man in the wards of a hospital, where there are a hundred people sick with ship fever, and he will not be so apt to take the disease as a good man would be apt to be smitten with moral distemper, if shut up with iniquitous companions. In olden times prisoners were herded together in the same cell, but each one learned the vices of all the culprits, so that, instead of being reformed by incarceration, the day of liberation turned them out upon society beasts, not men.

We may, in our places of business, be compelled to talk to and mingle with bad men; but he who deliberately chooses to associate himself with vicious people, is engaged in carrying on a courtship with a Delilah, whose shears will clip off all the locks of his strength, and he will be tripped into perdition. Sin is catching, is infectious, is epidemic. I will let you look over the millions of people now inhabiting the earth, and I challenge you to show me a good man who, after one year, has made choice and consorted with the wicked. A thousand dollars reward for one such instance. I care not how strong your character may be. Go with the corrupt and you will become corrupt. Clan with burglars, and you will become a burglar. Go among the unclean, and you will become unclean. Many a young man has been destroyed by not appreciating this. He wakes up some morning in the great city, and knows no one except the persons into whose employ he has entered. As he goes into the store all the clerks mark him, measure him, and discuss him. The upright young men of the store wish him well, but perhaps wait for a formal introduction, and even then have some delicacy about inviting him into their associations. But the bad young men of the store at the first opportunity approach and offer their services. They patronize him. They profess to know all about the town. They will take him anywhere he wishes to go—if he will pay the expenses. For if a good young man and a bad young man go to some place where they ought not, the good young man has invariably to pay the charges. At the moment the ticket is paid for, or the champagne settled for, the bad young man feels around in his pockets and says, "I have forgotten my pocket-book." In forty-eight hours after the young man has entered the store the bad fellows of the establishment slap him on the shoulder familiarly and, at his stupidity in taking certain allusions, say: "My young friend, you will have to be broken in;" and they immediately proceed to break him in. Young man, in the name of God, I warn you to beware how you let a bad man talk familiarly with you. If such an one slap you on the shoulder familiarly, turn round and give him a withering look, until the wretch crouch in your presence. There is no monstrosity of wickedness that can stand unabashed under the glance of purity and honor. God keeps the lightnings of heaven in his own scabbard, and no human arm can wield them; but God gives to every young man a lightning that he may use, and that is the lightning of an honest eye. Those who have been close observers of city life will not wonder why I give warning to young men, and say, "Beware of evil companions."

I warn you to shun the sceptic—the young man who puts his fingers in his vest and laughs at your old-fashioned religion, and turns over to some mystery of the Bible, and says, "Explain that, my pious friend; explain that." And who says, "Nobody shall scare me; I am not afraid of the future; I used to believe in such things, and so did my father and mother, but I have got over it." Yes, he has got over it; and if you sit in his company a little longer you will get over it too. Without presenting one argument against the Christian religion, such men will, by their jeers and scoffs and caricatures, destroy your respect for that religion, which was the strength of your father in his declining years, and the pillow of your old mother when she lay a-dying.

Alas! a time will come when this blustering young infidel will have to die, and then his diamond ring will flash no splendor in the eyes of Death, as he stands over the couch, waiting for his soul. Those beautiful locks will be uncombed upon the pillow; and the dying man will say, "I cannot die—I cannot die." Death standing ready beside the couch, says, "You must die; you have only half a minute to live; let me have it right away—your soul." "No," says the young infidel, "here are my gold rings, and these pictures; take them all." "No," says Death, "What do I care for pictures!—your soul." "Stand back," says the dying infidel. "I will not stand back," says Death, "for you have only ten seconds now to live; I want your soul." The dying man says, "Don't breathe that cold air into my face. You crowd me too hard. It is getting dark in the room. O God!" "Hush," says Death; "you said there was no God." "Pray for me," exclaims the expiring infidel. "Too late to pray," says Death; "but three more seconds to live, and I will count them off—one—two—three." He has gone! Where? Where? Carry him out and bury him beside his father and mother, who died while holding fast the Christian religion. They died singing; but the young infidel only said,

"Don't breathe that cold air into my face. You crowd me too hard. It is getting dark in the room."

Again, I urge you to shun the companionship of idlers. There are men hanging around every store, and office, and shop, who have nothing to do, or act as if they had not. They are apt to come in when the firm are away and wish to engage you in conversation while you are engaged in your regular employment. Politely suggest to such persons that you have no time to give them during business hours. Nothing would please them so well as to have you renounce your occupation and associate with them. Much of the time they lounge around the doors of engine houses, or after the dining hour stand upon the steps of a fashionable hotel or an elegant restaurant, wishing to give you the idea that that is the place where they dine. But they do not dine there. They are sinking down lower and lower, day by day. Neither by day nor by night have anything to do with idlers. Before you admit a man into your acquaintance ask him politely, "What do you do for a living?" If he says, "Nothing, I am a gentleman," look out for him. He may have a very soft hand, and very faultless apparel, and have a high-sounding family name, but his touch is death. Before you know it, you will in his presence be ashamed of your work-dress. Business will become to you drudgery, and after awhile you will lose your place, and afterward your respectability, and last of all your soul. Idleness is next door to villainy. Thieves, gamblers, burglars, shop-lifters, and assassins are made from the class who have nothing to do. When the police go to hunt up and arrest a culprit, they seldom go to look in at the busy carriage factory, or behind the counter where diligent clerks are employed, but they go among the groups of idlers. The play is going on at the theatre, when suddenly there is a scuffle in the top gallery. What is it? A policeman has come in, and, leaning over, has tapped on the shoulder of a young man, saying, "I want you, sir." He has not worked during the day, but somehow has raked together a shilling or two to get into the top gallery. He is an idler. The man on his right hand is an idler, and the man on his left hand is an idler.

During the past few years, there has been a great deal of dullness in business. Young men have complained that they have little to do. If they have nothing else to do they can read and improve their minds and hearts. These times are not always to continue. Business is waking up, and the superior knowledge that in this interregnum of work you may obtain will be worth fifty thousand dollars of capital. The large fortunes of the next twenty years are having their foundations laid now by the young men who are giving themselves to self-improvement. I went into a store in New York and saw five men, all Christians, sitting round, saying that they had nothing to do. It is an outrage for a Christian man to have nothing to do. Let him go out and visit the poor, or distribute tracts, or go and read the Bible to the sick, or take out his New Testament and be making his eternal fortune. Let him go into the back office and pray.

Shrink back from idleness in yourself and in others, if you would maintain a right position. Good old Ashbel Green, at more than eighty years of age, was found busy writing, and some young man said to him: "Why do you keep busy? It is time for you to rest." He answered: "I keep busy to keep out of mischief." No man is strong enough to be idle.

Are you fond of pictures? If so I will show you one of the works of an old master. Here it is: "I went by the field of the slothful, and by the vineyard of the man void of understanding; and lo! it was all grown over with thorns, and nettles had covered the face thereof, and the stone wall was broken down. Then I saw and considered well. I looked upon it and received instruction. Yet a little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to sleep. So shall thy poverty come as one that travelleth and thy want as an armed man." I don't know of another sentence in the Bible more explosive than that. It first hisses softly, like the fire of a cannon, and at last bursts like a forty-four pounder. The old proverb was right. "The devil tempts most men, but his tempt the devil."

A young man came to a man of ninety years of age and said to him: "How do you made out to live so long and so well?" The old man took the young man to an orchard, and, pointing to some trees full of apples, said: "I planted these trees when I was a boy, and do you wonder that now I am permitted to gather the fruit of them?" We gather in old age what we plant in our youth. Sow the seed in early life the right kind of a Christian character, and you will eat luscious fruit in old age, and gather these harvest apples in eternity.

I urge you to avoid the perpetual pleasure-seeker. I believe in recreation and amusement. God would not have made us with the capacity to laugh if he had not intended us sometimes to indulge it. God hath hung in sky, and set in wave and printed on grass many a roundelay for him who chooses pleasure-seeking for his life-work does not understand for what God made him. Our amusements are intended to help us in some earnest mission. The thunder-cloud hath an edge exquisitely purpled, but with voice that jars the earth it declares, "I go to water the green field." The wild-flowers under the fence are, but they say, "We stand here to be room for the wheatfield, and to refresh the husbandmen in their noonday." The stream sparkles and foams and frolics and says, "I go to baptize the moss. I live the spots on the trout. I slake the thirst of the bird. I turn the wheel of the mill. I rock in my crystal cradle muckshad and water-lily." And so, while the world plays, it works. Look out for them who always plays and never works.

You will do well to avoid those whose regular business it is to play ball, skate, or go a-boating. All these sports are good in their places. I never derived so much advantage from any ministerial association as from a ministerial club that went to play ball every Saturday afternoon in the outskirts of Philadelphia. These recreations are grand to give us muscular spirits for our regular toil. I believe in muscular Christianity. A man is often so near God with a weak stomach as when he has a strong digestion. But shun those who make it their life occupation to sit. There are young men whose industry and usefulness have fallen overboard from the yacht. There are men whose business fell through the ice of the skating pond, and has never since been heard of. There is a beauty in the gliding of a boat, in the song of skates, in the soaring of a ball-struck ball, and I never see one fly involuntarily throw up my hands to him; and, so far from laying an injunction upon ball-playing, or any other innocent sport, I claim them all as belonging of right to those of us who toil in the grand enterprises of church and state.

But the life business of pleasure-seeking always makes in the end, a criminal out of a sot. George Brummel was smiled upon by all England, and his life was given to pleasure. He danced with the peers, and swung a round of mirth and wit and applause, until, exhausted of pleasure and worn out of body, and bankrupt of reputation, and ruined of soul, he begged a biscuit from a grocer, and declared that he thought a dog's life was better than a man's.

Such men will come into your office and crowd around your anvil, or seek to do you off. They will want you to blink out in the midst of your busy day to give a ride with them. They will tell you of some people you must see; of some ersion that you must take; of some Sabbath day that you ought to dishonor. They will tell you of exquisite wines that you must taste; of costly operas that you must hear, of wonderful dancers that you must see; but before you accept their company or their companionship, remember at while at the end of a useful life you may be able to look back to kindnesses done, to honorable work accomplished, to virtue helped, to a good name earned, to Christian influence exerted, to a Saviour's use advanced—these pleasure-seekers on their death-bed have nothing better to reveal than a torn play-bill, a ticket for the races, an empty tankard, and the cast-out rags of a carousal; and as in the delirium of their awful death they clutch the goblet, and press it to their lips, the dregs of the cup falling upon their tongue, will begin to hiss and uncoil with the adders of eternal poison.

Again: avoid as you would avoid the path of your body, mind, and soul anyone who has in him the gambling spirit. One who wants to gamble, will find places just suited to their capacity, not only in the under-ground oyster cellar, or at the table back of the curtain, covered with greasy cards, or in the steamboat smoking cabin, where the bloated wretch with rings in his ears deals out his pack of winks at the unsuspecting traveler—providing free drinks all around—but in the gay parlors and amid gorgeous surroundings. We must at times have excitement. A thousand voices in our nature demand it. It is right. It is healthful. It is inspiring. It is a desire God-given. But anything that first gratifies this appetite and huris it back in a terrific reaction is colorable and wicked. Look out for the temptation that, like a rough musician, in tuning out the tune plays so hard he breaks down the instrument. God never made man strong enough to endure the war and tear of gambling excitement.

A young man having suddenly inherited a large property, sits at the hazard table and takes up in a dice box the estate won by a father's lifetime sweat, and makes it, and tosses it away. Intemperance soon stigmatizes its victim—kicking him out, a slavering fool, into the ditch, sending him, with the drunkard's hiccough, staggering up the street where his family lives. But gambling does not in that way expose its victims. The gambler may be eaten up by the gambler's passion, but you only discover it by the greed in his eyes, the hardness of his features, the nervous restlessness, the threadbare coat, and his embarrassed business. Yet he is on the road to hell, and no preacher's voice, startling warning, or wife's entreaty, can make him stay for a moment his mad career. The infernal spell is on him; a giant is aroused within, and though you may bind him with cables, they would not like thread, and though you fasten on seven times round with chains, they would snap like rusted wire; and though piled up in his path heaven-high, Bibles, tracts and sermons, and on the top should be the Cross of the Son of God, over them the gambler would leap like a roe over the rocks, on his way to perdition.

A man used to reaping scores or hundreds of dollars from the gaming table will not be content with slow work. He will say: "What is the use of my trying to make these fifty dollars in my store when I can get five times that in half an hour down Billy's?" You never knew a confirmed gambler who was industrious. The men given to this vice spend their time, not actively engaged in the game, in idleness, intoxication, or sleep, or in corrupting their victims. This sin has dulled the gambler's saw and cut the band of the factory wheel, sunk the cargo, broken the eth of the farmer's harrow, and sent a range lightning to shatter the battery of the philosopher. The very first idea in gaming is at war with all the industries of society. Any trade or occupation that is used is ennobling. The street-sweeper advances the interests of society by the cleanliness effected. But the gambler gives not anything for that which he takes. I recall that sentence. He does make a return; but it is disgrace to the man he fleeces, despair to his heart, ruin to his business, anguish to his wife, shame to his children, and eternal wasting away to his soul. He pays in tears and blood and agony and darkness and woe. What dull work is plowing to the farmer when in the village saloon in one night he makes and loses the value of a summer harvest! Who will want to sell tape and measure nankeen, and cut garments, and weigh sugars, when in a night's game he makes and loses, and makes again and loses again the profits of a season? John Borack was sent as mercantile agent from Bremen to England and this country. After two years his employers mistrusted that all was not right. He was a defaulter for eighty-seven thousand dollars. It was found that he had lost in Lombard street, London, twenty-nine thousand dollars, in Fulton Street, New York, ten thousand dollars, and in New Orleans, three thousand dollars. He was imprisoned, but afterward escaped, and went into the gambling profession. He died in a lunatic asylum. This crime is getting its lever under many a mercantile house in our cities, and before long down will come the great establishment, crushing reputation, home comfort and immortal souls.

The whole world is robbed! What is most sad, there are no consolations for the loss and suffering entailed by gaming. If men fail in lawful business, God pities and society commiserates; but where, in the Bible or society, is there any consolation for the gambler? From what tree of the forest oozes there a balm that can soothe the gamester's heart? In that bottle where God keeps the tears of his children, are there any tears of the gambler? Do the winds that come to kiss the faded cheek of sickness and to cool the heated brow of the laborer, whisper hope and cheer to the emaciated victim of the game of hazard? When an honest man is in trouble, he has sympathy. "Poor fellow!" they say. But, do gamblers come to weep at the agonies of the gambler? In Northumberland was one of the finest estates in England. Mr. Porter owned it, and in a year gambled it all away. Having lost the last acre of the estate, he came down from the saloon and got into his carriage; went back: put up his horses, and carriage, and town house, and played. He threw and lost. He started for home, and on a side alley met a friend, from whom he borrowed ten guineas; he went back to the saloon, and before a great while, had won twenty thousand pounds. He died at last a beggar in St. Giles. How many gamblers felt sorry for Mr. Porter? Who consoled him on the loss of his estate? What gambler subscribed to put a stone over the poor man's grave? Not one! Furthermore, this sin is the source of uncounted dishonesty. The game of hazard itself is often a cheat. How many tricks and deceptions in the dealing of the cards! The opponent's hand is oftentimes found out by fraud. Cards are marked so that they may be designated from the back. Expert gamblers have their accomplices, and one wink may decide the game. The dice have been found loaded with platina, so that doublets come up every time. These dice are introduced by the gamblers unobserved by the honest men who have come into the play, and this accounts for the fact that ninety-nine out of a hundred who gamble, however wealthy when they began, at the end are found to be poor, miserable, haggard wretches, that would not now be allowed to sit on the doorstep of the house that they once owned. In a gaming-house in San Francisco, a young man having just come from the mines deposited a large sum upon the ace and won twenty-two thousand dollars. But the tide turns. Intense anxiety comes upon the countenances of all. Slowly the cards went forth. Every eye is fixed. Not a sound is heard, until the ace is revealed favorable to the bank. There are shouts of "Foul! foul!" but the keepers of the table produce their pistols, and the uproar is silenced, and the bank has won ninety-five thousand dollars. Do you call this a game of chance? There is no chance about it. But these dishonesties in the carrying on of the game are nothing when compared with the frauds that are committed in order to get money to go on with the nefarious work. Gambling, with its needy hand, has snatched away the widow's mite and the portion of the orphans; has sold the daughter's virtue to get the means to continue the game; has written the counterfeit's signature, emptied the banker's money vault, and wielded the assassin's dagger. There is no depth of meanness to which it will not stoop. There is no warning of God that it will not dare. Merciless, unappeasable, fiercer and wilder it blinds, it hardens, it rends, it blasts, it crushes, it damns. Have nothing to do with gamblers, whether they gamble on large scale or small scale.

Cast out these men from your company. Do not be intimate with them. Always be polite. There is no demand that you ever sacrifice politeness. A young man accosted a Christian Quaker with "Old chap, how did you make all your money?" The Quaker replied, "By dealing in an article that thou mayest deal in if thou wilt—civility." Always be courteous, but at the same time firm. Say "no" as if you meant it. Have it understood in store, and shop, and street that you will not stand in the companionship of the sceptic, the idler, the pleasure-seeker, the gambler.

Rather than enter the companionship of such, accept the invitation to a better feast. The promises of God are the fruits. The harps of heaven are the music. Clusters from the vineyards of God have been pressed into tankards. The sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty are the guests. While, standing at the banquet, to fill the cups and divide the clusters, and command the harps, and welcome the guests, is a daughter of God on whose brow are the blossoms of Paradise, and in whose cheek is the flush of celestial summer. Her name is Religion.

Her ways are ways of pleasantness,
And all her paths are peace.

Peru's Gospel Progress.

An American Missionary Tells how the Work goes on at Lima—Protestantism Pioneering amid Poverty, while Romanism Revels in Riches.

"PERU for Christ!" is the sentiment that breathes through every line of a letter received by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD from Rev. A. R. Stark, one of our faithful independent missionaries at Lima. He writes:

"The work is pioneering, and, as you know, all such work has its difficulties and discouragements, but looking back on more than two years' experience our testimony is, 'Hitherto hath the Lord helped us.' The second year, although blended with hardships and persecution, saw an extension of the work in various directions. A foundation is now being laid for a real Gospel work in a country which has hitherto lain passive under the enslaving power of Romanism. Spiritually, morally and politically, Peru is in a pitiable condition. It is impossible to compass the idolatrous superstition and indifference around us. God alone can. We have only touched the fringe of this vast and complicated work. When will Christians bestir themselves to greater activity and consecration for the evangelization of the heathen? The country is run, almost, by foreign capital, European and American; but the soldiers of the Cross are conspicuous by their absence.

"The work at present is more hopeful than it has been. Bro. Jarrett and his wife have returned to Cuzco again, and despite the opposition, there is little fear of a second ejection. For the unjustifiable and illegal banishment of August last, the Government of Peru indemnified us. We hope, God willing, to open work in Bolivia this year. At present we are in correspondence with several consecrated young men, who are in training and hope to join us. I am also hoping to make a Bible tour in Bolivia shortly, as the way opens.

"A month ago, I returned with Bro. Backhouse from a tour along the coast. With increasing interest and blessing we journeyed from town to town scattering the precious seed. We were also able to sell or give away over four hundred and eighty Bibles, Testaments, and Gospels, as well as many Gospel tracts. The people generally are poor but welcome us eagerly until influenced against us by the priests."

Accompanying Mr. Stark's letter are two very significant photographs, reproduced on this page. They show, in startling contrast, the difference between the power of Romanism and Protestantism in that land—the one strong, rich, influential, and arrogant, with its full treasures, fine cathedrals, and priests innumerable; the other poor in the world's wealth, destitute of even the most ordinary accommodations, with no imposing edifices, and its missionaries laboring for the love of souls alone. Under priestly domination Peru has sunk to a condition of ignorance and superstition that is little short of heathenish. Up to a very recent date the American Bible Society, through its colporteurs, prosecuted the only Protestant work in Peru, by distributing the Bible, translated into Spanish. Mr. Penzotti, the Society's Agent (an account of whose life and labors has been published in these columns), was persistently persecuted by the Peruvian authorities at the instigation of the priests. At one time, so great was the indignation among the better class of Peruvians and the foreign residents of Lima, that mass meetings were held to agitate the subject of freedom of religion. Rev. Mr. Stark and his associates, Mr. Jarrett and wife, were also subjected to malicious persecution at the same dictation, and an effort was made to have them expelled from the territory. Now, however, as Mr. Stark's letter indicates, a revulsion of feeling has set in, and the Peruvian government and people are more generously disposed toward the Protestant cause.

Sunday School Lesson for May 31st. Luke 21: 30-36. Golden Text, Luke 21: 33. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

ALL the three evangelists, Matthew, Mark and Luke, record the solemn words of our Lord regarding his coming, and the time of the great tribulation, of which the destruction of Jerusalem was the rehearsal. Matt. 24 and Mark 13 are almost a repetition the one of the other. In Luke 12: 42-46 and 17: 22-37 is given much which is recorded by these two evangelists; but in his 21st chapter there is from verse 12 to 24, to show what shall be the distinctive character of the remaining times of the Gentiles, and then the account is resumed. Without this parenthesis it would read: "There shall be terrors and great signs from heaven. And there shall be signs in sun and moon and stars, and upon the earth distress of nations, in perplexity for the roaring of the sea and the billows; men fainting for fear, and for expectation of the things which are coming upon the inhabited earth." (Luke 21: 11, 25, 26, R. V. margin.)

This parenthesis, spoken to the twelve, gives a view of what the true followers of Christ have to expect before his coming. "If they have persecuted me, they will also persecute you; if they have kept my saying, they will keep yours also." (John 15: 20.) Synagogues and prisons, kings and governors, shall have to do with a people whom the world knoweth not, because it knew him not. "Ye shall be hated of all men for my name's sake," yes, even by parents, brethren, kinsfolk. But your loss shall be your gain; "it shall turn to you for a testimony." And a special promise is given to the persecuted, who are serving and waiting for the Lord. "Settle it therefore in your hearts, not to meditate beforehand how to answer, for I will give you a mouth and wisdom which all your adversaries shall not be able to gainsay." Stephen is a witness to the fulfillment of these words: "being dead, he yet speaketh" in the Word of God, which would be incomplete without his inspired biography. His persecution turned to him and to the Church of Christ "for a testimony" of Christ living again in his martyred follower; the council of Jerusalem were not able to withstand the wisdom and the Spirit by which he spake. (Acts 6: 10.) If every persecuted disciple of Christ had understood and followed the Master as closely, might not the Lord Jesus have come ere this? But alas, the Church of Christ has not understood her vocation to be a people who, under injustice, opened not their mouth. And not a hair of your head shall perish. The citizens of heaven may die but Jesus will raise them again at the last day incorruptible, not a hair having perished. He who has numbered them all has done so for the resurrection. He shall fashion anew the body of our humiliation that it may be conformed to the body of his glory. (Phil. 3: 21.) In your patience ye shall win your souls, or your lives.

It is at this point that the Lord speaks of the destruction of Jerusalem; and, that we may understand what he says, we must bear in mind that more than one destruction of Jerusalem is here indicated. When the Lord Jesus spoke these words, he had not yet been finally rejected and crucified by the Jewish rulers, and thus he does not distinguish between the destruction of Jerusalem during the Dispensation of the Christian Church, and her destruction in the time of the tribulation. In the time of Vespasian and Titus, Jerusalem was com-passed by the armies; the same thing shall occur again when all nations shall be gathered against Jerusalem to battle (Zec. 12: 2; 14: 2; Joel 3: 12, etc.), and a third time at the end of the thousand years' reign of Christ on earth with his saints (Ezek. 38: 39). But the scattering of Israel which is prophesied here, is undoubtedly that which we see fulfilled before our very eyes, for the Jews are to be found in every country. But this state of things is beginning to change in a most remarkable way, as the Jewish people multiply; they having about doubled in numbers in our generation, having risen to financial and intellectual superiority throughout the world, and having their eyes and their hopes turned to the land of God's promise. At the same time, Jerusalem is almost wholly rebuilt, and the new Jewish streets just in the direction prophesied in Jeremiah 31: 38, 39. Surely "the time of the Gentiles" must be nearly at an end. "And then shall they see in a cloud with power and great glory." And again Christ spake a word to those who settle in their hearts not to meditate how to answer their enemies, or to defend themselves; those who dare to trust God to defend them, those who in their patience win their souls, the unconquerable men of faith. What is his Word to them, while men around are fainting for fear? The world's death knell is the marriage chime for them. "When these things begin to come to pass, then look up and lift up your heads because your redemption draweth nigh," (verse 28.) Lift up your heads, the fig-tree, the old stock of Israel is budding; the kingdom of God, which it is your Father's good pleasure to give you, is nigh. This generation, the Jews, my covenant people, shall not pass away till all these things be fulfilled. They are my standing witness. "Heaven and earth shall pass away" from the face of him that shall sit upon the great white throne, (Rev. 20: 11), "but my words shall not pass away."

And yet another word of warning. "Take heed to yourselves," lest haply your hearts be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and cares of this life, and that day come on you suddenly as a snare, for so shall it come on all them that are [lit. trans.] "dwellers on the earth," those whose home is down here, who are not citizens of heaven. In the passages in Revelation, where the expression occurs: "them that dwell on the earth," we see, with terrible clearness, what will be the ultimate development, and what the appalling fate of those dwellers upon the earth. If we are looking, day by day and hour by hour, for our Lord from heaven, who shall transform our bodies in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, when this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal immortality. (1. Cor. 15: 51-53), it is impossible that our hearts should be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, and with the cares and anxieties of this life: we cannot be true citizens of heaven and still "mind earthly things." (Phil. 4: 19.) In the last terrible days of the great tribulation, when the "man of sin," the great Antichrist, shall be revealed, "all that dwell on the earth shall worship him," his false prophet shall deceive them that dwell on the earth (Rev. 12: 6-14); they that dwell on the earth shall wonder at the resurrection of this great Antichrist of Christ, when he rises from the dead, because the resurrection of him who is Christ indeed, has not laid hold of them, they do not know "the power of his resurrection." (Phil. 3: 10.)

To them whose citizenship is in heaven, the coming of the Lord will not be as a snare to entrap them, but like the whirlwind which caught away Elijah, and which will take them whither their heart and their treasure is. They have long been sitting "in heavenly places in Christ Jesus" (Eph. 2: 6), their spirit has long been at home in heaven, and now their bodies, changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, shall be caught up thither, too, and those that sleep in Jesus who have loved his appearing (II. Tim. 4: 19), shall be first resurrected in undying bodies, as the living are also changed. Corruption shall disappear and mortality be swallowed up in life (II. Cor. 5: 4). But not all shall thus be taken away. To them that look for him [or wait for him] shall he appear the second time without sin into salvation" (Heb. 9: 28). And our Lord here says: "Watch ye at every season, making supplication that ye may prevail to escape those things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man" (R. V.)

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

JEWS AT THE WAILING PLACE.

Already, from this hill, Christ had looked at the city on the crest of the opposite hill, and had wept over it. His prophetic vision saw it as it would be some forty years later, and he mourned over the destruction and desolation that would then be visible instead of the magnificence before him. That thought was in his mind when, as the little party left the Temple that evening, probably the Tuesday evening three days before the Crucifixion, his attention was called to the massive stones of the walls and the beauty of the Temple buildings. His reply showed the sorrow that filled his heart. All these glories would be scattered and the magnificent buildings overturned. It would doubtless take some time for the disciples to recover from the amazement produced by such an answer. We can imagine their dwelling upon it and talking of it as they climbed the hill, and then, probably, sitting down to rest, with the city and Temple in full view, asking the question which elicited this discourse: "When shall these things be and what sign will there be of their coming?" Christ did not limit his answer to the direct reply to their question. His gaze took in a much larger area than this comparatively near catastrophe. Beginning with the immediate future, he described the period of persecution which was to follow his ascension, and gave them instructions as to their conduct under arraignment and trial and the family hostility, which would be the experience of his followers. Following on this, would be the destruction of the city. The event proved the value of his warning. The city was encompassed by the armies under Cestius in the year 66. But the siege was raised, and many people who had taken flight returned to the city, believing the danger was past. The Christians, remembering the Lord's warning, did not return, and they escaped the awful suffering and massacre when the Romans returned under Vespasian and Titus and finally took the city and burned the Temple. Jerusalem was to be trodden down and the people scattered until the times of the Gentiles were fulfilled. They are not yet fulfilled, but Christ's hearers would have little idea of the centuries that were covered by the brief sentence. Then his gaze traveled onward to a still more distant part of prophetic landscape. It is the far horizon where at the end of the Dispensation, at general perplexity and apprehension, Son of man is seen coming to judgment. Very little does he say on this subject, returning to the present situation, he gives practical warnings. "When these things begin to come to pass," they are not to panic-stricken. As the budding of trees betokened the coming of summer, the events which he had described as now at hand, the persecutions and trials, would indicate the beginning of the kingdom. The generation would see it. They were to temperate and unworldly, and to live so as to be accounted worthy to stand before him.

There shall be great distress in the land. Josephus relates that during the terrible siege of Jerusalem in the year 70, the suffering of the people from famine was describable. He says (Wars book vi: c. "If so much as the shadow of any kind of food did anywhere appear, a war would have commenced presently, and the dear friends fell a-fighting one with another about it, snatching from each other the most miserable supports of life. . . . The hunger was so intolerable that it obliged them to chew everything, while they gazed such things as the most sordid animals would not touch, and endured to eat them. Nor did they at length abstain from girdles and shoes, and the very leather that belonged to their shields they pulled off and gnawed." He then goes on to tell a typical case of a mother whose pangs of hunger became so great that she killed her infant at her breast, and roasted it and devoured one-half of it herself. The smell of the roasted flesh brought a crowd around her house who demanded some of the meat; but when they saw what it was, they would not touch it. Josephus says "the number of those who perished in the siege was eleven hundred thousand," and ninety-seventh thousand were carried captive. These did not all belong to the city, for "they were come up from all the country to the feast of unleavened bread [the Passover], and were on a sudden shut up by the army."

Let at any time your hearts be overcharged. A writer compares the Christian's condition to a man whom a lecturer on electricity used as an example of the power. So long as the man stood on the floor the mild current passed through him with no visible effect. But he stepped on a stool resting on glass feet, and then when anyone approached him an electric spark shot out. He was isolated by the glass. If a Christian would have power that others could feel, and have influence over them, he must be separated from the world by his connection with Christ, and must not be connected with it by his appetites and love of pleasure.

Pray always that ye may be accounted worthy. "I have been praying for assurance of salvation," said a distressed woman speaking to her pastor. "God does not answer my prayer. Will you pray for me? I want to feel sure of being saved. I am in doubt all the time and I am miserable." The pastor listened for a long time to the poor creature's trouble, and then said: "Your prayers you say do not seem to be answered; suppose you were to change their tone. Do not be so anxious about being saved, but pray that God would enable you to do your duty, to serve him so well and so constantly that you may be a blessing to all about you. Don't you think you may trust God about that reward?" The woman took his advice and her cheerfulness returned.

When all things that are written may be fulfilled. "A man goes to an hotel," says an eminent preacher, "and as soon as he sits down he begins to order his dinner all the delicacies in season and the best of the wines. He chooses the best room and requires every attention. By-and-by the bill is forthcoming and it takes him by surprise. 'I never thought of that,' he says, 'I forgot all about that.' The hotel keeper looks at him in amazement, not knowing if he is a fool or a rogue. 'You never thought of the reckoning? You thought you could live as you pleased in my house and there would be no account. We will see about that,' and the man is arrested for defrauding. That is the way many live. They forget that a day is coming when they must be called to account."

BRAVE PIONEERS IN A NEW FIELD.

The First Party of Workers of the African Inland Mission—A Perilous Desert Journey—The First Station Planted and Work Begun.

LESTER SEVERN. BERTHA RECKLING. WALTER WILSON. REV. WILLIS HOTCHKISS.
MINNIE LINDBERG. REV. PETER SCOTT. MARGARET SCOTT. REV. MR. KRIEGER.

THE PIONEER PARTY OF MISSIONARIES AT NZAWI.

ALTHOUGH Africa has long been the scene of missionary effort, and at no time as energetically as during the last two decades, there are still many parts of its vast territory that are yet in the darkness of heathen idolatry, ignorance, and superstition. Up to the present time, if we except the Southern portion, the Gospel territory may be said to consist merely a fringe around this great continent. On the borders of the Sahara, in the Soudan, and in the territories penetrated by the numerous tributaries of the Upper Nile, the Congo, and the Niger, there are still great tracts of populous country scarcely explored, and where the Gospel has never yet been preached.

Three years ago, Rev. P. Cameron set, then a missionary in the Congo Free State, conceived the project of a Gospel expedition for the purpose of founding mission stations in the Soudan. Several attempts had already been made by others, by way of the West Coast, up the Niger River, or inland from Sierra Leone, as well as by way of the Sahara, and even from Egypt; but none had succeeded. After a careful study of the field, Mr. Scott became convinced that the key to the Soudan lay by the way of the East Coast. Acting in concert with a number of other Christian gentlemen who were imbued with the missionary spirit, the African Inland Mission was organized in 1895, with Mr. Scott as Director, and Rev. Fred Krieger, Rev. Willis Hotchkiss, and Mrs. Margaret Scott as associate officers of the new mission. A Home Council was also appointed, consisting of Messrs. Charles E. Hurlbut and Jas. H. McConkey, and the home headquarters of the mission were established at the Bible Institute, 5415 Lansdowne avenue, Philadelphia. The purpose of the new organization is to plant a line of mission stations at suitable points between the East Coast and the centre of the Soudan, the objective point being Lake Tchad, about 2000 miles in the interior in the very heart of Africa, and with five great kingdoms around its populous shores. It is estimated that in the whole territory to be penetrated there are in all twelve native kingdoms, with ninety millions of people, who till now have not had among them a single witness for Christ.

In August 17, 1895, the first party of missionaries of the African Inland Mission sailed from New York for the scene of their future labors. It included besides Rev. Messrs. Scott, Krieger and Hotchkiss five others, viz.: Mr. Walter McL. Wilson, Mr. Lester Severn, Misses Margaret C. Scott, Minnie Lindberg, and Bertha Reckling. The last named returned after accomplishing only a part of the journey.

This pioneer party reached Mombasa, October 27, and on November 12, the men began the journey inland, leaving the ladies at the coast until arrangements were made for their safe and comfortable transportation. There were in this first party fifty-two carriers, ten soldiers as escort, with several boys, a cook, and two head-men, and they traveled in company with a caravan—the whole being about three hundred strong. It was a toilsome journey of thirty-two days, seven night. Once a great lion boldly came into camp, tore down a porter's tent and ran off with it to the bush. Dysentery, chest trouble and fever were prevalent among the porters, but the majority stuck to their loads and did their work cheerfully. Some caravans from Uganda were met whose men were like skeletons, so greatly had they suffered from hunger and thirst. On Thanksgiving Day, the mission caravan held a special service on the march, to render thanks for God's goodness all through the desert.

The history of the rest of the journey was a series of adventures, more or less exciting, narrow escapes from wild animals, and savage neighbors, amid all of which they were divinely protected. Fever prostrated each in turn and many times the travelers were face to face with death. At last, in mid-December, they reached the Nzawi Valley, where they established the first station of the African Inland Mission. It is on a beautiful and salubrious site, four thousand feet above sea level at the base of Mount Nzawi, and with the Nzawi River at the foot of the hill. It is northwest of Mount Kilimanjaro, and about 250 miles from the coast. There they were granted 250 x 400 yards of land for the mission buildings and a sufficient plot of ground for cultivation. The station is in the Wakamba country, and there are several Wakamba villages nearby, the whole presenting a fine field for missionary work, and the people being industrious, intelligent, and peaceable. The climate is comparatively good, and the nights are cool and pleasant. Within a few days, temporary buildings for the mission were completed, one being a "grass house," fourteen by thirty feet (which is shown in the illustration on this page), a brick house built of sundried brick, 50 x 15 feet, with

Some of the men you all know and love, has begun school with some boys. Brother Peter Scott left about a week after our arrival, to choose a site for another mission and build the house for it. You may be sure we were holding him up in prayer that God would guide him and give him wisdom. We received word from him to-day. The new station is at Lake—distant about twenty-five miles, a field of labor for brother Hotchkiss. The people there, according to brother Scott's account, are not so friendly as they are here. They told him they would be glad to show him out of the locality. He told them he had come to stay, and after a long palaver, told them that they ought to be ashamed to treat a stranger so. When they presented him with a ram. Wood is scarce and they did not want him to cut any, and wanted to show fight. He took two men and an axe and went to the best looking tree he could find. He made preparations as if going to cut it, whereupon an old man came up very excitedly with demonstrations to quit. Scott, however, continued his preparations, and when the old man's excitement was about highest, asked him if he wished to save this tree to take him to a place where he could get one as good, which the native was only too glad to do. After the incident, the chief of the district not only gave permission to cut all the wood he would need, but actually offered to carry it for him. It seems that the first-mentioned tree marked the grave of some mythical personage, buried there long, long ago. I tell you these incidents that you may know just how we are placed, and you'll know better what to pray for, and that you may see also that God can turn the hearts of all men as he pleases. So never let us be discouraged at appearances but go forward, believing that as we come to the mountains of difficulty, trial or doubt that look formidable to us at the distance, he will either remove them or make them of no account. Yours truly, Wm. McL. Wilson.

Another party of missionaries will shortly leave for this new field, and will probably include Mr. and Mrs. John Scott, Rev. and Mrs. Thos. H. Allan, Miss Ina Scott, who for two years has been a teacher in the Catherine Mission New York City; Miss Gamber, and Mr. J. S. Tool. The African Inland Mission is strictly interdenominational and evangelical, and its workers include artisan missionaries as well as regularly ordained preachers. It is supported wholly by the voluntary offerings of Christian people. The workers go without any stated salary. The Home Council at 5415 Lansdowne avenue, Philadelphia, receives all communications and contributions for the work, and has full authority in the selection and forwarding of recruits for the service in the field. It has before great possibilities as a mighty agency for spreading the Gospel of Jesus.

What One New Testament Did.

There is a little hamlet of charcoal-burners in the valley of Joshu, in India, where within a few years a wonderful transformation has taken place. The people were living godless lives—more like the brutes than human beings, and without a thought of the life hereafter. A missionary, in passing through the valley, spoke to the people. Two men became interested and purchased a copy of the New Testament. Their employers days being spent in camp sick with African fever. An Arab chief, Mbaruk, had declared war and a strong military escort was a necessity. Some of the porters deserted en route. Occasionally their caravan was fired upon by hostile natives. The impure water made the white men sick, and water of any sort was very scarce. At one point they met a caravan, eleven of whose members had perished of thirst. In a crisis, an abundant rain averted a similar fate from befalling the mission caravan. They passed through countries abounding in game: ostriches, partridge, zebra, antelope, guinea-fowl, and giraffe. After leaving the Wataita country, they were in a part of Africa where lions and leopards were kept at a distance only by vigilance by day and blazing camp-fires by a stone foundation of two feet, the walls at the base being seven feet high, and another a cook house. Mission work was begun at once, and the outlook is decidedly encouraging.

In a recent letter from the pioneer station of the mission, Capt. Wilson writes as follows:

DEAR BRETHREN:—It is with great joy in the Lord that I write to you. Although no doubt to you, as to me, all that is done seems small, still it all has part in God's great plan. I've seemed to do so little myself during the last fortnight. I had six attacks of fever in that time, and on my third day with unfailing regularity. To-day I feel better and perhaps have broken the spell of it. I think you have been kept informed by our dear sister Delany, and how our party had to divide up, leaving the ladies behind at the camp. But now God has graciously been pleased to bring them all to health and strength to the scene of their future labors, so that sister soon noticed a change in the grade of charcoal from these two men—it was more carefully burned, was better packed, and free from stones and grass. This charcoal was looked upon as a special brand, and brought a special price.

When Sunday came, work was suspended, and these men, with their families, gathered for religious worship and the study of the Book. Shortly after, they began to reclaim the mountain land about them, to plant wheat and garden stuff, and recently one built a neat frame house in place of his old hut. He is the most efficient and trustworthy man in the mountain, and he says he owes his new vigor to his weekly day of rest, and that without it and his Testament he could not do his work. Others are following his example.

A Christ-Like Work.

How a Few Colored Graduates Established a School for Neglected Children in South Carolina and have Conducted It.

An interesting story of hard work and self-sacrifice in the interest of others, is told by Miss Emma J. Wilson, an intelligent, cultured, colored teacher of South Carolina. She is one of the organizers of the Mayesville Educational and Industrial Institute in Sumter County, which is the outcome of an effort on the part of a few educated colored people to benefit the children and young people of their own race. In Mayesville and in the large district of which it is the centre, the colored population is numerous and it is increasing rapidly. All the elements of a thriving, enterprising community were there, if they were intelligently developed. But, unhappily, little was being done for the mental and moral advancement of the young folks. They were growing up in ignorance and in the moral deterioration which results from ignorance. Yet they were bright children with quick intelligence and with keen appreciation of the few opportunities of acquiring knowledge that came in their way. Among the Mayesville people were a few colored young men and girls who had enjoyed the advantage of training in the Goodwill and other similar institutions. They saw more clearly than others how deplorable the situation was. But apparently nothing could be done. The white people of the district were in no condition to deal with the problem and it seemed as if the new generation would grow up as ignorant as the present one.

Several attempts were made to establish schools, but the insuperable difficulty was always that there was no money to erect suitable buildings, to provide educational appliances, and to pay the salaries of trained teachers. That the problem was serious, and that it ought, in the interest of the general public, to be solved, none could deny, but in the absence of the funds necessary for the initial expenses, nothing was done. The colored graduates previously mentioned were obtaining positions and were doing work which proved what the colored race is capable of when education has been afforded. Only two or three remained, and these made an effort to solve the problem. They resolved to sacrifice their present and future interests for the sake of these poor, untutored children. Without funds or the prospect of any, they opened a school. For a nominal rental the use of a Methodist Church on week days was secured, a few worn school-books and second-hand appliances were obtained, and the word went around that a school was open.

The result surprised even the young people who made the effort and who were in a position to know, too, the keen desire there was for education. On the first day there were ninety-three applicants for admission. These came not only from Mayesville itself, but from the district for miles around. Several of them lived three miles away from the little Methodist Church, and two—a brother and sister—lived five miles away. So eager were they to avail themselves of this opportunity to gain a little education, that they thought nothing of walking that long distance morning and night, in all weathers, to attend the school. These children have been regular and punctual in their attendance, and have made excellent progress. This attempt to solve the problem was humble, but it has proved successful. The school has now nearly a hundred and fifty pupils, and considering its deficiencies in books and educational appliances, has worked wonders. A photograph of the pupils and teachers is reproduced on this page. Such necessary expenses as there have been, have been met chiefly by the children's fees. The modest sum of ten cents a month was fixed as the fee each child must bring to the treasury, and even that amount proved prohibitory in many instances. "You have no idea in the North," Miss Wilson pathetically says, "what poverty is. You cannot realize what a dollar means in the home of a colored man down there. There must be scheming and contriving and continual vigilance to keep that ten cents for the month's school teaching from being used during the month for some other purpose." When we think of the children trudging their three and five miles in the morning and the same distance at night; of their parents economizing in their poor homes to have the ten cents for each of their children ready on the regular day, and of the teachers contriving to live and pay the rent of the school out of a total income of fifteen dollars a month, the spectacle has a pathos all its own.

This humble effort in so praiseworthy a cause has had the hearty sympathy of the white population from the first. They have helped in organizing a board of trustees and managers, and have rendered help in occasional emergencies. Now and again they have paid the fees of some promising child whose parents were too poor to defray them. Dr. J. E. Stevenson, the pastor of the Mayesville Presbyterian Church, Dr. J. A. Mayes, a venerable physician, and Hon. George W. Murry, the ex-Congressman of the District, have all in their several ways, given encouragement to the workers. Dr. W. B. Derrick, of New York, the Secretary of the Board of Missions of the A. M. E. Church, who knows the district well, and who saw the school in operation, also speaks in the highest terms of the work.

The success that has attended gladly help in the building. Altogether, it is estimated, the total cost, including furniture and appliances, would not exceed fifteen hundred dollars. With such a building, useful trades, such as shoe-making, carpentering and blacksmith's work, might be taught for the boys, and sewing and cooking for the girls. What has already been accomplished shows how such an education would be appreciated and how much it might do to help the young people and to raise the status of the entire community.

"It is a large sum," Miss Wilson admits, "and to our people in South Carolina, it seems prodigious, a heap of money far beyond the possibility of our obtaining. But it would do so much for so large a number, who, without such help, must grow up to swell the ranks of unskilled labor and with no hope but a hand-to-mouth existence. God has been very good to us, hitherto. We have had our health, none of us has ever repined over unremunerated labor, and it has been a delight to see how the children have worked to make the most of the opportunity. The teachers might all have made money elsewhere, but we have trusted in our Lord's promise: 'Thou shalt be blessed; for they cannot recompense thee; but thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just.' We have no doubt of that promise being kept and that is more than sufficient for ourselves. But for these others, who are longing for knowledge, whose lives would be transformed by a practical education

PUBLISHER'S ANNOUNCEMENT.

"WE greatly prize the two beautiful slabs of Palestine Olive Wood you sent us," writes a subscriber from Burlington, Vt. All who have seen them declare that, apart from the tender and holy associations they recall, they have nowhere else with a wood so deep and rich in color and so delicate in design. I regard my Mount Olivet keepsake as a treasure worth many times the money paid for it." We still have some very beautiful specimens of these Olive slabs left, which we will send to any of our readers at the nominal charge of twenty-five cents apiece, postage prepaid.

It is wonderful how much light has been thrown on the study of the Bible within a generation. Our fathers and grandfathers, if they had a good old Bible with a few marginal or foot-notes to illustrate their progress in intricate or obscure passages, considered themselves fortunate. The "Reference Bible" was an improvement on this. Now, however, no man how old your Bible may be—and we know how dear are the associations that often cling to the old Book that belonged to father or mother—you can very readily render available all the cumulative study and theological erudition of the centuries. You can have at your hand such a library of Bible information as will serve you in every emergency—Bible lands and their peoples the history of the sacred books, chronology, maps, explorations, concordance, harmony—all together in compact form in a volume entitled: Helps to the Study of the Bible, which you can procure by sending fifty cents to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, we pressing all charges on the book.

When Mr. Greene gave his stunted praise to F. D. Greene's book, The Rule of the T, he did so doubt because he had examined it and found it to be the best and most comprehensive and reliable presentation of the Armenian horrors yet published. Mr. Greene spared nothing—nothing back; the whole shameful story is revealed with a vividness that startles and that dignifies the reader with a really only at the burning question: "What shall be done with Armenia?" Meanwhile, in order to fully understand this latter-day tragedy, all should read The Rule of the T. In order to make propaganda for Armenia and that the public may have a better understanding of the situation, it has been decided to offer Mr. Greene's book during the remainder of the present month at a discount of one-half off the usual price. This fifty cent book will therefore be sent during May by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at any address, postage paid, for 25 cents.

One Cause of Regret.

In the course of a revival address, Moody related the following instructive incident in his personal career: "To remember the following act I would give my right hand. On the night when the court-house bell of Chicago was sounding an alarm fire, my sermon was upon, 'What shall we do with Jesus?' And I said to the audience, 'I want you to decide this question by next Sunday.' What a mistake! That night I saw the glare of flames and knew that Chicago was doomed. I never saw the audience again. Shall we not decide now, so that whenever our Master may come we shall be ready?"

encourages the workers to hope for still better things. From the beginning, they have looked forward to a time when they might have a building of their own in which greater facilities would be afforded.

That hope, however, seemed a dream until recently. But now an opportunity of securing an eligible site has occurred, on condition that such a building shall be erected upon it. The condition, of course, is utterly beyond their power to fulfil; they have given themselves to the work, but they have no money to give. They thought, however, that if the friends of the colored race in the North knew what they had done already, and of the opportunity they had of doing more, that the necessary funds would be supplied to put up the building.

They would like to erect a building capable of accommodating five hundred children and, if dormitories were provided, and board furnished at moderate rates, the beneficial influence of the institution would be widely extended and its chances of self-support increased. The lumber for such a building could be obtained at a low rate and the people of the neighborhood would under Christian influences, we venture to plead. Large as the sum that we require is, we have faith that God will give it to us, in some way. He heard our prayers when the way seemed closed against the beginning of the school; he has heard them when we have gone to him in emergencies since then and, though this is a much greater matter, it is not too great for him. If we were asking it for ourselves, we should have doubts about his hearing us, but this is for the children, who if we get our building, will learn there to know him and trust in him and live honest, Christian lives. He knows the need, he knows our motive, and I believe he will give us all that is necessary."

We think so, too. The Lord's stewards have not ceased to listen to his voice and if this thing is of him, as it appears to be, it will be accomplished. The spirit in which it was undertaken and it has been carried on, has the right ring—that of disinterested helpfulness. Any contributions our readers feel moved to send for the purpose, we shall be pleased to receive and acknowledge, and will remit them to the Treasurer of the Building fund.

The Caprice of Jenny Shaw.

LADY, will you please give me a flower?"

The request came from a ragged little girl, with toes peeping out from her broken shoes, and an old shawl drawn over her head and shoulders in hood and wrap. Miss Jenny Shaw had a large bouquet of hot-house roses at carnations in her hand, carefully protected from the frost by a layer of paraffine paper under another of white tissue. Shaped as the bundle was, the wistful eyes of small Maggie O'Brien divined its sweet contents, and she put up the petition, familiar to all who have ever carried flowers through streets or alleys where the poor live in their crowded, hive-like homes. One spring or summer day, nobody with a atom of kindness in her nature can cry flowers through Cherry street, or along the thronging highways of Front, or Sixth, or Roosevelt street, in New York. Children, both boys and girls, will beg them so insistently that their cry for the blossoms cannot be refused.

"Lady, dear lady, please give me one flower."

The child's entreaty was urgent. Miss Jenny stopped, and looked kindly into the eager, quivering face, a face that would have been pretty had it been clean, and rosy, and plump, but was now thin and blue-eyed.

"Why do you want a flower, dear?"

"For my sister. She's sick; she's going to die, doctor says. It would make her happy!"

"What is your name, my little friend?"

"Maggie, ma'am, Maggie O'Brien, and my sister's name is Anne Rosina."

"I'll go home with you and see your sister," said Miss Jenny.

In her beautiful dark cloth gown, her tiny gloves and thick-soled boots, Miss Jenny Shaw was a type of the well-dressed, sweet, wholesome, strong, and alert-looking New York girl, the girl of the best society, no finer specimen of young womanhood existing in the world. She was her way to a reception, and the roses she had bought were intended for her dearest friend; but Jenny Shaw was one of those who hold themselves ready at any moment, to go on the King's errands, and day-by-day, she was at the Master's side. The reception could wait. She would do the next thing, and go now with Maggie O'Brien, to visit her suffering sister. The two picked their way across the street, their path leading through a long of sailors of all nationalities. Some queer and foreign-looking with gold rings in their ears, and shining dark curls on their heads, some red-faced and bronzed like the Scotch or English stock from whom they came, all a people bearing in their looks the marks of their trade. Presently Maggie darted into a narrow court at her guide followed, and they entered a tenement house in the rear.

Upstairs went Maggie, and upstairs went Miss Jenny, till opening a door on the top floor, the two stood before one of the common tragedies.

Her bed was made on a low lounge, and her mother was near her; a bent, faded image of a woman, once no doubt a beauty for the blue, Irish eyes were still large and soft and tender of expression; and her black hair had not lost its tendency to line into rings and curls. A handful of fire was burned in the little stove, and a stew of olives was simmering there.

"O'Brien," said Maggie, breathlessly, "a lady's come to see Annie."

"And whatever made ye bring a strange lady here?" began the mother irritably, when a cry from the ailing daughter silenced her words. The "rose whose root is death," the beautiful fatal hectic flush burned on her thin face, her countenance had become as delicate as a transparency, but a smile lit it up, as she saw the flowers.

"Yes," said Miss Jenny, "Your little girl told me you had sickness here, and I ventured to intrude. I know how one loves flowers when one is ill and cannot go out," and she pulled off the rolls of paper, and laid the great, beautiful bunch of roses on the bed beside the dying girl.

Jenny Shaw will never to her own dying day, forget the rapture which swept over that pallid face, as Anne Rosina, in her feeble fingers seized that glory of bloom. For once in her life she was for a few moments lifted above pain, above fear, above want. God was speaking to her, and his words were of the deepest love, spelled and syllabled in roses and carnations.

"For God so loved the world," said the young lady in a low, reverent voice, "that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but should have everlasting life."

Afterward she could not explain to herself why she had chosen that particular text; it seemed just to come to her. The girl holding the flowers looked up and smiled, a smile that said, whatever her creed:

Jesus can make a dying bed,
Feel soft as downy pillows are
While on his breast I lean my head
And breathe my life out sweetly there.

"She's a Christian, is my Annie," said the poor, faded mother, "and she's not afraid to die. She's sure, somehow, that the dear Lord will look after her."

"Our blessed Lord knows about me," said Annie, slowly but firmly, "all about me."

Miss Jenny slipped a bank bill into Mrs. O'Brien's hand, and left an order for coal and groceries to be sent to that home, before she went on to the reception. There were flowers in banks and sheaves, the portieres looped with them, the mantels hidden, the rooms fragrant with hundreds of roses. A band was playing delicious melodies behind a screen of palms; a table was loaded with salads, ices, and creams, and a gay throng of people surged in and out the canopied doors.

But Jenny Shaw was absent-minded. Thoughts of Annie Rosina O'Brien came between her and the society women with whom she chatted. She took her leave soon and went home, to look at her little bank-book, and to think how much she could do with the rather small balance left over from her winter purchases.

"I think," she said, "I will spend all my money and most of my allowance this season on flowers for the poor."

"No, mamma," she answered, when the next day her mother proposed going with her to purchase a fur cape, concerning which there had been some conference between them. "No, dear mamma, I'll do without it. I'm going to set up a flower-window in S— court, where the children may look at roses these spring days, and from which the sick may have them if they need them, as they always do."

"Jenny Shaw," said her mother, "you cannot stay there all day and every day, seeing to your flowers, and giving them away."

"No," she replied, "but I have a business head, papa says, and I'll put it to account, and do that part by proxy."

Jenny's caprice is a very lovely one, and it bids fair to last. Her flower-window is like a star of hope, in the desolate desert, to the people who pass it every day, people who have few flowers in their lives.

Armenia's Only Hope.

ising an abundant crop will all fall to the Kurds, who will not even take the pains to cultivate it and bring it to the harvest. And all the spring sowing will be left unown—a state of things that can hardly fail to cause famine in the fall. There will remain then the alternative of massacre or wholesale emigration. * *

"We have been reluctantly obliged to cut down the bread rations of all the city poor one-half, and by this means we were able to close two of the six Bakeries. The ovens supply 7467 persons with bread daily—of whom 3220 are city people, and 2247 villagers. The supply of one person a day with bread at full rations costs about two cents."

Sometime ago, it was feared that the Armenians in Palestine might share the fate of their countrymen and co-religionists in Asia Minor, as the attitude of the Moslem population of Jerusalem and other cities was full of menace, while the disturbances were taking place elsewhere. Owing largely to the tact of the Armenian Patriarch in Jerusalem, Mgr. Vehabidian, who persuaded the Armenians to remain quietly in their own homes and not to frequent the streets, as well as to remain indoors at night, and especially to avoid all appearance of agitation or excitement, trouble was averted and no collisions occurred. Now that the skies are somewhat clearer, the Armenians of Palestine are grateful to their Patriarch, whose wisdom and forethought prevented what might have proved a great disaster. A portrait of Mgr. Harutuni Vehabidian, the venerable ecclesiastic, appears on our first page. There is a rumor that he is of Arabic descent. In his youth he visited America. He was educated in the Armenian monastery at Jerusalem and was ordained vartabed. He was prelate of the Armenian diocese of Erzerum for many years and was afterward elected Armenian patriarch of Constantinople. Some eight or ten years ago he resigned and was next chosen as patriarch of Jerusalem. He belongs to the conservative school, but enjoys the confidence and sympathy of the whole Armenian nation.

Our Fresh-Air Work.

DURING the past two summers, the Fresh-Air Work at our "Children's Home" at Mont-Lawn, has been steadily extending. It will be remembered by many of our readers that, the first year, nearly 1200 children enjoyed a ten-day's outing at the beautiful and salubrious country Home which is situated on the banks of the Hudson, overlooking the village of Upper Nyack, thirty miles from New York City by boat. Last summer, over 2200 little ones were accommodated at the Home. It is proposed to resume the work about June 15th next, and there is every likelihood that the number of tenement and slum children who may come to us from the lower parts of New York this year will not fall short of 3000.

It is a large as well as a blessed undertaking, this, of freshening up the bodies and gladdening the hearts of the little waifs of our big metropolis in such numbers. To those of our friends who have helped along the work by their personal contributions in the last two seasons, as well as to many others whom we hope to interest in it this year, we would say: There is a special blessing for all who reach out the hand of help to a little child. We do not know of any more beautiful charity in this wide land, with its thousand works of philanthropy, than that which aims to make our neglected children of the streets happier, healthier, better little souls than they have hitherto been. Their gratitude is boundless, for there is not in the child the element of selfishness that is frequently found in the adult; a child rarely forgets the friends of its childhood. The memories of kindnesses shown to it are cherished long after manhood or womanhood has been reached, and the moral influences that may be thrown around it, even during a brief ten-day sojourn at Mont-Lawn, may make an indelible impression upon the whole life. We have already encountered many instances of this in our Fresh-Air Work, where the children have not only been themselves greatly changed by the experience, but have been the means of bringing about a change in others, with whom they have come in contact. "A little child shall lead them." Every little waif who goes home from Mont-Lawn ruddy and happy, is a tiny Gospel of God's goodness; a wee Evangel, to carry light and sweetness into the darkened tenement or the slum.

We wish all our friends to have a share in this work. Help the little ones to a pleasant outing; it is a trifle to you, but an immensity to them. Just think of it! Three dollars will cover the entire cost of a child's ten-days' outing at Mont-Lawn while the city is sweltering in the torrid mid-summer. It will pay for the little one's transportation both ways, for medical care and attendance, for food and shelter at Mont-Lawn, and for a hundred little pleasant enjoyments unknown to the child of the streets, but which go to make such an outing memorable. There are probably very few readers of this journal who have not in recent years been personally and actively interested in some of the great philanthropies in which our friends have engaged; but here is one that lies at home, right close by us, and which deals with the little toddlers we meet everywhere. Therefore, we say don't forget the Fresh-Air Fund. It will give you a feeling of gladness all the summer through to remember that you have been the means of sending one little waif to Mont-Lawn, of bringing joy into one poor little heart, and it may be, of bringing back the roses of health to the sick and suffering.

Over-Worked Americans.

SOME of our people have read till they are crazed of learned blacksmiths who at the forge conquered thirty languages, and of shoemakers who, pounding sole-leather, got to be philosophers, and of milliners who, while their customers were at the glass trying on their spring hats, wrote a volume of first-rate poems. The fact is no blacksmith ought to be troubled with more than five languages; and instead of shoemakers becoming philosophers, we would like to turn our surplus of philosophers into shoemakers; and the supply of poetry is so much greater than the demand that we wish milliners would stick to their business. Extraordinary examples of work and endurance may do as much harm as good. Because Napoleon slept only three hours a night, hundreds of students have tried the experiment; but instead of Austerlitz and Saragossa, there came of it only a sick headache and a botch of a recitation. We are told of how many books a man can read in the five spare minutes before breakfast, and the ten minutes at noon, but I wish some one could tell us how much rest a man can get in fifteen minutes after dinner, or how much health in an hour's horseback ride, or how much fun in a Saturday afternoon of cricket. He who has such an idea of the value of time that he takes none of it for rest, wastes all his time.

What Part First?

IF you are troubled with scepticism, my advice is that for six months you stop reading other portions of the Bible, and read only the Evangelists—Matthew, Mark, Luke, and John. "But," you say, "is not all Scripture given by inspiration of God, and profitable?" Oh, yes. So are all the medicines in the apothecary shop good and useful, but they all have different uses and are to be administered under different circumstances. Here are aloe and arsenic and opium and Peruvian bark, all good in their places, but in one condition of the system this medicine may cure you, and in another it may kill you. Now, I say that the ninth chapter of Romans, which is a glorious tonic to a strong Christian, is to you, in your present condition, arsenic, and if you do not stop taking it, at any rate in such large quantities, it will kill you. You have asked me to prescribe, and now in the name of the Great Physician I ask you if you will take the prescription? You will never reason your way out of these perplexities. The devil has had his way with you long enough. He has robbed you of the peace of a whole lifetime and is now trying to strangle your immortality. You say you have been advised by Christian people to sacrifice on this subject your reasoning faculty. I give you no such wretched counsel. Hold your augmentation in reserve. The infantry go into the fight on the plain, the batteries are on the hill, and will in due time be unlimbered. So go into this discussion with your heart. Hold your logic and your argument in reserve for a later period of the conflict. Before you get through your earthly battles, you will need not only the Minie's rifle, but all the Columbiads. There is a time in a young man's life when he thrusts his finger in the arm-hole of his vest and tosses his head and gives a Byronic laugh at Christianity, or asks Tom Paine's question about the serpent in Eden, or the miraculous conception of Jesus Christ. But it is a good deal easier to get lost in the jungles than to get out of the woods.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

W. F. N., Hazleton, Pa. How many have suffered martyrdom in Armenia in the last year?

In 1895, up to the middle of December, 80,000 had been killed in the towns and villages and 425,000 were reduced to starvation, many of whom doubtless perished. All are entitled to be regarded as martyrs since they might have saved their lives as others did, by renouncing Christianity. There were thousands who died with Jesus' name on their lips. The true number of Armenia's martyr host will never be known.

E. E. D. What is the meaning of the inscription I. H. S., as found on crucifixes, altars, etc.? They represent three Greek words.

They are variously interpreted. They form the first three letters of the Greek word that stands for Jesus. The Jesuits claim that they are purely Latin and are the initials of "Iesus Hominum Salvator," (Jesus Saviour of Men). Another view is that they relate to the Cross and are the initials of "In Hoc Signo" (In This Sign), the legend being borrowed from the luminous cross which Constantine and his army are said to have seen displayed in the sky.

Chaplain McDermott, of the Norriston, Pa., prison, writes:

As an evidence of the wide influence of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, I have been the recipient of packages of papers from various points of the compass for the prison, where I have the privilege of serving as Chaplain, having been interested in this work since 1860. I have only learned to-day by a postal that this idea of sending papers had its origin with THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The papers have been distributed—the valuable reading will do great good. For the present we have enough.

Such of our friends as are sending religious reading—matter to prisons and hospitals, should be careful to send only printed matter that is in good condition, clean and legible. In all cases the packages should be prepaid.

J. M. B., Colchester, N. S. 1. Is it right to say of a man who trusts in his conversion as evidence of his salvation, that he is not truly converted? 2. Is perseverance as necessary to salvation as the new birth?

1. We are not sure that we quite understand your question. A man who is living in sin and basing his hope of salvation on some past experience, has reason to doubt whether he was truly converted. A man who has been truly converted may fall into sin, but he will not continue in it. He will go to Christ and ask to be forgiven and will be very vigilant against falling again. If the experience has not borne fruit in purity of life and increase of faith and love there is ground for doubt about its being genuine. It was probably merely intellectual or emotional and not a change of heart. 2. The new birth always implies perseverance. If the man does not persevere it is safe to infer that he was never really born again. "By their fruits ye shall know them."

Reader, California. How do you reconcile your statement that the Revised Version is superior to the Authorized Version with Dr. Talmage's assertion that he believes every word of the Bible? The Revised Version is in some instances very different in the meaning it gives by the changed forms of expression?

The more the Bible is valued and studied the more welcome is new light upon it, and the more anxious is the student to have it absolutely correct. The revisers had the benefit of ancient manuscripts, the existence of which was not known at the time the King James version was prepared. They had also a better knowledge of the Oriental languages. The result is seen in a greater accuracy of translation and in less ambiguity in expression. The passage to which you call attention is evidently a copyist's error. The period is given correctly in Kings.

A. L. M., Cargill. What becomes of the soul at death? Does it lie dormant till the resurrection, or does it go at once to its final destination?

God has not seen fit to reveal the condition of the soul immediately after death. In the absence of any explicit statement we have to be guided by inferences. These, in our opinion are overwhelmingly opposed to a condition of dormancy, though they indicate a fuller life after the resurrection. A few of these inferences are as follows: Christ's statement to the dying thief that that day he would be with him in Paradise. His parable of Lazarus and Dives which described Dives as being conscious at the time that his five brethren were living on earth and therefore before the resurrection. The presence of Moses on the Mount of Transfiguration. Paul's desire to depart and "to be with Jesus" which so active and zealous a worker would not have felt if he had expected a condition of dormancy to be his after death. John's vision (Rev. 6: 9) of the martyrs who had been slain speaking before the resurrection. All these passages appear to us to imply conscious existence in the disembodied state, and a preservation of identity.

D. M. E., Elizabethtown, Pa. 1. While waiting for a train, a trolley car came rumbling along with a usual crowd, when an old man close by remarked: "That must be what the prophet referred to when he wrote, 'And they shall jostle each other, and run through the streets like lightning.' Is there such a passage, and where found?" To whom and under what circumstances was this poem written, "God moves in a mysterious way?"

1. The passage referred to is in Nahum 2. It was written by William Cowper on a peculiar occasion. He had a hallucination it was the Divine will that he should drown himself. Accordingly, he set out in a canoe to the River Oise, intent on self-destruction, but the driver missed the way and soon the suicidal mood passed. On his return, he wrote the poem, in a feeling of thankfulness at being providentially saved from a great crime.

A. D. M., McConnellsville, O. Why did Jesus heal some of those he healed to keep silence about the healing and tell others to proclaim it to their friends?

In the former he probably was anxious to avoid the publicity it would give. He did not wish to be regarded as a mere wonder-worker. His miracles were his credentials that were worked to convince men that he came from God and was authorized to teach and preach. The proclamation of the healing might divert public attention from his mission. It might also provoke the hostility of his enemies who might be moved to interfere with his work. Where he required a healed person to declare it he may have desired to influence a community and to inspire the people with faith in him. It may have been necessary to the healed person that he should make a public acknowledgment.

L. L. J. What would be the Christian way to aid you lived where there are no means of grace except a small Sunday School, where the teacher and superintendent favor and do such things as card-playing and similar evils, and who this fourteen years up tells them there is no harm in any amusement that gives us pleasure, while there is no sin in the amusement itself; that be a Christian it is not necessary to give worldly pleasure? Can such a Sabbath School do any good? Will not its influence be bad?

Accepting your statement as accurate, nowise exaggerated, it is evident that Sunday School, teachers and pupils included, stands in urgent need of a sound Christian Superintendent. Its influence, as now conducted, cannot be other than pernicious, since it inculcates a false standard of religion, ginning with Sabbath desecration. The Christian makes no compromise with sin; he puts everything behind him that will hinder his spiritual progress. Card-playing has been a step on the road to ruin for hundreds thousands. Religion need not deprive any of innocent amusement, but there are many worldly pleasures that should be given up since they are unprofitable and lead to evil associations. This view of the matter should be laid before the school, and if no other remedy is available, you should apply to the American Sunday School Union to send you a missionary temporarily, who will plant your school on a sound basis, and bring order out of the present spiritual chaos.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Abyssinia at Peace.

RECENT cable dispatches announce that Gen. Baldissera, the new Italian commander in Abyssinia, has succeeded in relieving the beleaguered garrison at Adigrat which it was feared would fall into Abyssinian hands. There appears to have been a fierce battle before the siege was raised, but in the end the Italians were victorious. They liberated their countrymen who have been shut up in Adigrat since the battle of Adowa, but they did not make no attempt to retain possession of the fortress, but to content themselves with the former frontier line. Kusa and Erythrea are to be retained, probably in fulfilment of pledges to England. Negotiations have been opened with King Menelik for the ransom of Italian prisoners in his hands and orders have been given for the withdrawal of twelve battalions of Italian troops which formed part of the invading army. This is apparently the end of the distressing Abyssinian campaign which has been a severe humiliation and a loss of prestige to Italy. The losses in men and money have been enormous. The latest figures show that exclusive of native troops there were 11,400 men engaged at Adowa and of these 743 were killed or taken prisoners. This is no reflection, however, on Italian bravery. The army was hopelessly outnumbered and appears to have fought with desperate gallantry. In several regiments of batteries only about ten or twelve men of the hundred survived the battle. The forward columns were surrounded and cut down before the main body could go to their assistance, and when they did reach the field they were organized by the retreat of their fleeing comrades. General Baratieri, who was in command, is to be tried by court-martial at Massowah for incapacity and negligence. It is expected that the triumph over the Italian invaders will result in the complete unification of Abyssinia under King Menelik, who, previous to these troubles, had not been recognized as Emperor throughout the whole land. His influence as King of Shoa, the most southern and best organized of the Abyssinian states, had, however, given him a paramount claim on the political leadership which had distanced all his rivals. It is now stated that the ceremony of his coronation as Emperor had been set for the very day on which the battle of Adowa was fought. The withdrawal of the Italians will leave him at liberty to consolidate his authority and to harmonize the political institutions of the different states composing the empire. That may prove a more difficult task than defending the country against a foreign foe. Monarchs have often found, as men find who try to govern themselves, that they have more reason to dread the opposition within than the foe outside. In another sense than that which the words first bore, a man who was acting as temporary clerk for a dealer in plate glass in Brooklyn. The man appears in the city directory as Robert Graham, clerk; but as he explained to the reporter, Burke's Peerage classifies him as Sir Robert James Stuart Graham, tenth baronet of Esk. He is a lineal descendant of Robert Bruce and is a claimant to the estates of Strathorne and Annandale. By a series of misfortunes the family lost its estates and all its wealth so that the father of the present head of the house was glad to cross the Atlantic and settle in Toronto where he had an offer of employment. After his death, the eldest son, to whom the title descended, came to New York, dropped his title and went into business. He did not succeed and ultimately obtained a clerkship in a Brooklyn house. But there came a time of depression in the trade and the firm in reducing its staff discharged the baronet. Since that time he has been unable to find permanent uniform height and that some had projecting angle-irons, which almost touched the ties. If any cars of that kind were in the rear of the train, he would inevitably be killed. There was no time for deliberation and the man thought quickly. As the next set of trucks went over him he seized a brake-rod and, with almost a superhuman effort, swung his body to the brake-beam. Here he was safe, as many a tramp knows. But he became alive to a new danger. The shock of his fall, the sense of his peril and the effort of catching the brake-rod had acted on his nerves, and to his horror, he realized that he was going to faint. Before he lost consciousness, he locked his arms with a death grip on the iron fittings, and in that position, without any knowledge of where he was, he rode nine miles. When the train reached Chicago, he was missed and search was made. Sad experience taught the brakemen where to look for traces of such an accident and in examining the wheels and trucks he was found, still insensible but unhurt. So firm was his clasp even then, that it was difficult to remove him. The event proved that he had done the wisest thing possible to him, in trusting to his muscles retaining their hold when he had no longer the power to control them. We may hope that he will not forget his experience when he thinks of the time which comes to all when he will become aware that watchmen can see under it, over it, and on all sides. Its steel walls, six inches thick, have heavy outer and inner doors which lock by separate combinations, and no one man is allowed to know them both. Within, there are a number of compartments, each with its own door and combination lock. Electrical wires, connected independently with each door, communicate the fact of that door being opened to the police, and to watchmen in the Clearing House and the Equitable Building. In this vault, which is constructed to hold one hundred millions, the money was deposited, and certificates of its being there were issued to the several banks jointly responsible for its safe-keeping. Unless some unexpected emergency arises, it will be a long time before that gold is disturbed again. The certificates representing it will be accepted with perfect confidence, because everyone will know that the bank issuing them has the gold in the vault. It is strange that while men will so trust in each other, it is so difficult to get them to trust in Christ who has said:

I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich. Rev. 3: 18.

BRIEF NOTES.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would be glad to have from every church in which it has a subscriber, one copy of its latest annual statement, showing its numerical strength and financial condition.

The New York State Sunday School Convention will be held in the Broadway Tabernacle, New York, June 2-4.

Three sessions will be held each day. Among the speakers announced to take part in the proceedings are Drs. A. J. F. Behrens, A. F. Schaffner, J. L. Hurlbut, and P. Fagnani. This is the first time in twenty years that the Convention has met in the city.

We are Glad to Learn from a letter just received from Mrs. Joseph Cook, that Dr. Cook is gradually recovering from the illness with which he was seized in Melbourne, Australia, last September. We are sorry, however, to hear that he is not yet able to write the articles he hoped to have furnished to this journal. Mrs. Cook expresses her regret that at present he is unable to do any literary work.

At the recent meeting of the American Bible Society, the Secretaries reported to the Board that the aggregate issues for the year ending March 31, 1896, were 1,750,283 volumes, being an increase of 169,155 volumes over the issues of the year immediately preceding. This striking fact was also stated, that for the first time in the Society's history, the aggregate number of volumes circulated abroad during any single year exceeded the number circulated in the United States. In China alone, nearly 400,000 volumes were issued, and the entire circulation in foreign lands amounted to 890,150 volumes.

The Sydney, Australia, Journals Describe the visit of Rev. C. H. Yattman to that city as a time of unprecedented religious interest. The size of the audiences and the enthusiasm kindled were something to which the Australians had never seen a parallel. The Y. M. C. A. of the city gratefully acknowledges a large increase of funds in response to his appeals.

Peoria, Ill., has a Munificent Benefactor in the person of Miss Lydia Bradley, who has already given that city a hospital, a home for aged women, a church, and a park of 145 acres, and now declares her intention of erecting a Polytechnic Institute, which, with its endowments and appurtenances, will represent a cost of $1,000,000.

Extensive Preparations are Being Made for the celebration of the Jubilee of the Evangelical Alliance. A hearty welcome is assured to the American delegates, as the action of the Alliance in moving for the promotion of international arbitration and for prayer in the recent Venezuela trouble, has evoked a very cordial feeling between the American and English branches.

In a Recent Address Before a Boston Association, the Hon. A. D. White, ex-Minister to Russia, called attention to the alarming increase of crime in the United States. As an illustration, he quoted the statistics of homicide, which in 1889 showed 3567 persons killed, while the number last year was over ten thousand. He said there was no country in the world where murder was so frequently committed and so seldom punished.

News of the Destruction of a Mission and the disappearance of two English missionaries in the Solomon Islands has been brought by the steamer "Monowai," which arrived at San Francisco on May 10. The reports are somewhat indefinite, but it would appear that the mission was attacked by the cannibal natives, and that while some of the missionaries succeeded in making their escape to Sydney, two are missing, and it is feared that they have been killed and eaten. The missionaries of the Islands bear a bad reputation, and many white men, traders and sailors, have fallen victims to them at various times. The mission there is a sheltered belonging to the Protestant Episcopal Church, and was established by Bishop Selwyn in 1857. The Island is to the east of New Guinea and northeast of Australia.

employment. He is now living with his wife and four children on the top floor of a poor apartment house and acknowledges that he finds life a hard struggle. He never uses his title and has no higher ambition than to be able to pay his way and maintain his family decently. The fact of his having a title and of his name being printed in the list of the British nobility does not help him. It seems rather to mock his poverty. It is not so with the nobility of the kingdom of heaven and with the record of their names kept there. Whatever their condition in this world, they can obey Christ's command:

Rejoice because your names are written in heaven. (Luke 10: 20.)

A Brakeman's Peril.

Chicago journals report an escape from death almost without parallel in railroad annals. An experienced brakeman, on a train that was running into Chicago, missed his footing in stepping from one car to another and fell between them, on the ties. When such a catastrophe occurs, the unfortunate man is generally ground to pieces; but this man, lying limp between the ties, was unhurt, save for the bruises caused by his fall. The brake beams and the trucks underneath the cars passed over his body without touching him. Another man in that position, would have probably congratulated himself and remained still. But this man knew too much about the construction of the cars to feel safe. He knew that all brake-beams were not of a that he is again going to lose consciousness and never regain it in this world. If in that hour he is clinging to Christ with the strength he that night put into his grip on that rod, he need have no fear, for Christ will hold him safe and he can say with the great Apostle:

I know in whom I have believed and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed unto him. (1st Timothy 1: 12.)

Gold by the Ton.

People on the New York streets during the past few days may have seen a truck laden with boxes, proceeding from a building on Broadway to another building in Cedar Street. A policeman was in attendance on the wagon, and two others watched its being laden and unladen. There was nothing else remarkable about the wagon or its burden, and the passer-by would have been surprised to learn that there was two million dollars in gold, weighing two tons, on the wagon. The gold was being removed from the vaults of the Mercantile Safe Deposit Company to the new vault built for its reception in the Clearing House. Thirty-two million dollars in gold were removed in this way, in sixteen trips of the wagon, without a mishap. On the arrival of the wagon at the Clearing House, each box, containing fifty thousand dollars, was taken from the load and placed on a sidewalk elevator and so lowered to the vault. This vault is a marvel of ingenious devices to ensure safety. It is a huge steel box, resting on piers, so ISERY, squalor, and degradation sit side by side in all the great cities of the East. Even in the smaller towns and villages, the conditions of life are such as would make a European or American shudder, unless, indeed, he had been used to contemplating the wretchedness of some portions of lower New York, or the poverty of certain sections of London or Paris. But even these have some relieving features, while in the East, away from the homes of the rich, the evidences of absolute poverty are everywhere abundant. Even in a great city like Constantinople, it is apparent that the laboring population, through long ages of indigence, have been ground down to the lowest social level, from which it would seem impossible to rise.

Our photograph shows a group of dwellings in one of the poorer streets of Stamboul—the older city. The houses are old frame structures of a type that is very common. There is neither stoop nor porch, and an alcove window over the doorway is the sole attempt at ornamentation. Small, narrow windows give a hint of the lack of ventilation, and the lower part of the house is usually a gloomy place. Built close to an old, dilapidated wall—probably some ruined aqueduct or ancient tower—the general situation is anything but a cheerful one. Nor is the interior social life of the family of this class a whit more attractive than the box-like dwelling. Artisans, porters, and laborers of all sorts live in such houses. Yet Stamboul is a beautiful city, and in the near neighborhood there may be some grandly imposing mosque, or perhaps an old palace, with rare gardens and picturesque grounds, shut out, however, by high walls, from the envious eye of poverty. It is a city of contradictions, the loveliness and grandeur of the East mingling in sharp contrast with its squalor and rags. Miles of rich bazars, containing everything that is costly and unique in silks and jewels, hundreds of khans, or "camping hotels," thousands of hovels, many of them more dilapidated than those in the photograph, and mosques and minarets overtopping all and looking out upon the blue waters of the Bosphorus beyond. Many epochs are represented in the old city of Constantine, which has not changed its character in the passing centuries. It shows the toothmarks of time, of earthquakes, of sieges, of wars, and of conflagrations. For beauty of situation and commercial importance it should be—as it once was—the Mistress of the East, instead of a city of princes and beggars, of vice and corruption. It has shared the fate of every city where the Crescent waves, for an history shows that the rule of the Turk is everywhere followed by decay in art, architecture, and commerce. Such is the Stamboul of to-day, and such it will remain until its true destiny is realized as the capital city of a free Christian nation, after its present possessors have been driven out of Europe.

Betrothals in Angola.

Some of the old customs that still prevail among the Angolans on the West Coast of Africa are entertainingly described by Heli Chatelain. Concerning betrothals among the natives, he writes: "A boy's sweetheart is called his kuloka. This word is derived from the verb ku-loka, to swear, to confirm by oath. All the presents he makes to his kuloka, however insignificant, are registered on a sheet of almaco paper. This is a strong, bluish, ruled paper of foolscap size. The presents generally consist of diamba, which is the wild hemp used as opium, and of handkerchiefs. The girl who has accepted the offerings of a youth cannot become the wife of any other. In case he should die, or she should break her vow and give herself to another person, the latter is obliged to refund the injured party or his family the equivalent of the expense incurred for the sake of the girl. The mere attempt to estrange a girl's affection may be punished with a fine corresponding to the amount expended in securing such affection.

"Supposing that the young man has not two girls from her school took an examination in the State Institute at San Sebastian, attended only by boys, and received the highest mark given by the Institute—Sobresatiente, "leaping over everything." In 1894 four girls received the certificate of completed work in the State Institute of Guipuzcoa, San Sebastian, entitling them to the degree of Bachelor of Arts, "the first time," we are told, "in the history of Spain that girls taught by women had obtained such recognition." This college is the fountain of whatever temperance sentiment there may be in that country of grapes and wine. Graduates leaving the institute carry temperance principles with them, as was the case of one who organized a Union in a village in the southern section. Womanhood has now a wider field and a higher meaning in Spain.

A Pretty May Entertainment.

As several readers have written us announcing a purpose of aiding our Fresh Air work at Mont-Lawn by some home entertainment, and asking for a suggestion, we give for their benefit this brief description of a May festival from an article in The Home Magazine. The room or hall must have a raised platform for the display of tableaux. Let it commence with a May song, followed by a charade, "May Morning," the first part arranged to introduce the word May, the second, Morning, while for the whole the winding of the Maypole may be represented, the girls being dressed in white with wreaths of flowers on their heads. Let the ribbons be long enough to permit ease of movement, has not at the time the means wherewith to give the wedding-present, the parents can claim payment after the elopement. When the young man is too poor to pay the kilembu at once, he must go to work and earn it. If, after due allowance of time, he should fail to pay off the debt, his wife has the right to seek or accept another husband; but the latter is bound to refund to the first husband all his disbursements during the time of wooing, in addition to the kilembu claimed by the parents."

Bright Spanish Girls.

Until recent years, woman's education was practically ignored in Spain, except among the wealthier class. Now, however, this is greatly changed. The International Institute for Girls at San Sebastian is celebrating its twenty-fifth anniversary. It was founded by Mrs. Alice Gordon Gulick, President of the Spanish W. C. T. U. No thought was given for the higher education of girls by the educators of Spain, and it fell to Mrs. Gulick to set in motion forces for progress that all reading are bearing rich fruitage. In 1800 and try to have a variety of figures. Pretty ones will doubtless be invented in practice. A good commencement is to join hands in a circle and pass around the pole as far from it as the length of the ribbons will permit, then let each hold the ribbon in the left hand and move about it, all taking care to keep the same distance apart, then at a signal, wheel, hold the ribbon in the right hand and move in the opposite direction.

Next, let all stand, holding the ribbon in the left hand, at an equal distance apart. At the signal one turns, changes the ribbon from the left to the right hand and, facing her companions, passes around the pole under the ribbons—which must be held somewhat high—until the length is used. The next then does the same, and the figure continues until all the ribbons are used and the girls stand clustered closely around the pole. Let the scenes of "May Morning" be followed by another May song, during which the first of a set of tableaux, of a character to suit the occasion, can be arranged. Such a party may be held any time during the month of May. There should be a very small charge for admission as spectators.

The Time of Blossoms.

SING loud, O bird in the tree!
O bird, sing loud in the sky,
And honey-bees, blacken the clover bed—
There is none so glad as I.

The leaves laugh low in the wind,
Laugh low with the wind at play;
And the odorous call of the flowers all,
Entices my soul away.

For O but the world is fair, is fair—
And O but the world is sweet!
I will out in the gold of the blossoming red,
And sit at the Master's feet.

And the love my heart would speak
I will fold in the lily's rim,
That the lips of the blossom, pure and true,
May offer it up to him!

Then sing in the hedgew green, O thrush,
O skylark, sing of the blue!
Sing loud, sing clear, that the King may hear,
And my soul shall sing with you!

Squandering Moments.

TO many young people, the habit of economizing time is a severe task. They cannot be brought to realize the value of the swiftly-flying moments with the oncoming of years and larger freedom, every squandered opportunity lamented. A writer in Faith and Works says the remark of a girl who "had just twenty minutes," awakened a train of thought that led far away, introducing her into a mathematical country where she was speedily lost among rows upon rows of figures. As she tried to find her way through them they became a very labyrinth which she vainly endeavored to pierce in order to ascertain just what sum she had lost minutes all over the world, counting from the beginning of the Christian Era, might amount to.

But as nothing definite could be gained in the region of mathematics, she turned then to the department of prevention of disease, to see if any means had been devised there to check the great waste. In one corner several cards, printed in large letters were hanging on the wall. Foremost among these was printed Richard's well-known saying: "Dost thou love life, then not squander time, for that the stuff life is made of." N. B. by was a line from Young Night Thoughts, "Time was existence, used is life." Another selection from the same poem read:

Procrastination is the thief of time;
Year after year it steals, till all are fled.

On still another were the words:

Time flows from instants and these each one
Should be esteemed as if it were alone.

Everything in nature is "time," the sunrise and sunset, the seasons, the coming and going of the birds, the opening and shutting of the flower, the tides, and the planetary revolutions. Nature never wastes a moment nor leaves an opportunity unimproved. Even the smallest cranny of the rock has room for a bunch of soil, a drop of dew, a flower with its dash of color, and the grateful incense of its aroma, which it daily sends upward to its Maker.

Home-Coming.

The home-coming of any of the family who has been away should be made as much like a festival as possible. When one has been away visiting friends and enjoying new scenes, and being made much of and entertained as a guest of honor, there is sometimes a rather sudden letting down and a little sense of flatness in the return to the domestic fireside. Home is the dearest place in the world, yet it is occasionally dull, and, to youthful natures, insipid. Let it be kept interesting by a spice of variety. And if only one cares, very little trouble by way of change will give the altered aspect which pleases the eye and excites the mind. A flower or two in a vase, a fresh cloth on the table, a new dish, the best cups and saucers, and an air of preparation will give the dear one the delightful knowledge that the home-coming brings joy to the others.

Readiness for Death.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor topic for the Week Beginning May 31. att. 2: 36-15.

SINGULARLY in contrast are the Topic and the passage of Scripture associated with it. The second coming of Christ, to which the passage undoubtedly refers, means life not death to the generation which will witness it. In every generation from the beginning, death has been the close of life, the gate by which we have gone from the world's activities into the realm of silence and mystery; but when Christ comes, the power of the last enemy will be broken and this mortal will, without death, put on immortality. "We shall not all sleep, but we shall all be changed." To indicate readiness for death by reference to promises of the abolition of death, is a course indicative of the perversity which spiritualizes the natural meaning out of Scripture.

Whether, however, we look forward to death as the close of a life in this world, or to the based hope of the Lord's coming, which will save us from passing through that ordeal, a duty in life is one and the same. He who can say from his heart, "Even so, Lord Jesus, come quickly!" is the man who can meet death tranquilly. Him, the dark valley of the shadow of death is illumined by the faith which has committed his soul to him who is able to keep it against that day, and to cry, "Behold, the Bridegroom cometh," will find him waiting, with the oil of spiritual grace stored for the glorious service of welcoming his Lord.

Readiness for death can be gained in one way only. It can never come through ceremonies, nor through assurances of priests, or ministers. Though a man were baptized by an angel, and though he were made a member of the most orthodox church under heaven, his readiness for the great change might still be a matter of doubt. Doubtless many will pass safely through the ordeal and will enter eternal blessedness who are not ready for it. With in Christ, exercised even in the eleventh hour, will be ignored of God, and, even in the last extremity, he will cast out none who come to him. But such late conversions do not make one ready for death. As we look on a corpse we realize what death means to man on this side the veil. It means the laying aside utterly of the body, which has been a habitation and the means of enjoyment and expression through life. Whatever may be the conditions of that existence, it is not an existence in which all physical gratification is absent. To a man, therefore, who has known no pleasures, no delights, save those he had appreciated and enjoyed through the senses, the future life will be one of strangeness inconceivable.

Not ready for that life there must have been a spiritual life in this world above and apart from the physical life. The longing after righteousness, the effort for the attainment of purity of heart, the aspiration after Christ-likeness, must have been experienced and cultivated before there can be readiness for a life in which only the spiritual will survive. Here those have been felt, the other life will be a continuation of this and the absence of the body will be a relief. No more can pain and weariness and temptation reach the soul by that channel. No longer must the higher nature contend for mastery with the lower nature. To be ready for death is to be ready for fuller, better life. The change has no terrors for him who yearns for spiritual development. It is emancipation, and he welcomes it with joy. The way, therefore, to be ready for death is to seek the higher life of the spirit which will go on after death.

It Is Not Dying.

NO, no, it is not dying
To go unto our God,
This gloomy earth forsaking,
Our journey homeward taking
Along the starry road.
No, no, it is not dying
Heaven's citizen to be;
A crown immortal wearing,
And rest unbroken sharing,
From care and conflict free.
No, no, it is not dying
The Shepherd's voice to know;
His sheep he ever leadeth,
His peaceful flock he feedeth,
Where living pastures grow.
O no, it is not dying,
Thou Saviour of mankind!
There streams of love are flowing,
No hindrance ever knowing;
Here, drops alone we find. —MALAN.

A Fair Exchange.

What shall a man give in exchange for his soul?
Mark 8: 37.

THE soul of man, created by a breath
Of God, a part indeed of him who made
The world, and all that in it is;
Whose mighty voice the elements obeyed,
At whose command the hills came forth
And verdure clothed the plain;
Who guides the planets in their course,
And makes the changing seasons go and come again.
What can we find in all the earth,
On mountains high, or in the deepest cave
Where richest ores lie hidden from the light,
In valleys wide, or 'neath the briny wave,
Where lie the brightest gems that God hath made,
O'er which the mighty billows roll:

Can we find there a treasure fair
Whose value equals just one soul?
It is in value greater far
Than anything that earth can give,
Because the things of earth decay,
But evermore the soul shall live.
And living it shall still improve
And evermore its power expand,
Till it shall know God's great design,
And his wise purpose understand.
But Christ hath bought it with a price,
For his own life he freely gave
As an atoning sacrifice
The soul of man from death to save.
We can avail the price he paid,
Who hath redeemed us by his blood
On Calvary shed, in fair exchange
For our soul, when 'tis lost to God?

Our Prayers.

ART thou aware of our selfish prayers?
Forever crying, "Help me, save me, Lord!"
We stay fenced in by petty fears and cares, Nor hear the song outside, nor join in vast accord.
And yet the truest praying is a psalm:
The lips that open in pure air to sing
Make entrance to the heart for health and balm;
And so life's urn is filled at heaven's all-brimming spring.
Is not the need of other souls our need?
After desire the helpful act must go,
As the strong wind bears on the winged seed
To some bare spot of earth, and leaves it there to grow.
Thy large bestowing makes us ask for more.
Prayer widens with the world through which love flows.
Needy, though blest, we throng before thy door:
Let in thy sunshine, Lord, on all that lives and grows!

A Chapter of Six Visions.

A Remarkable Series of Six Apocalyptic Scenes Described by the Seer of Patmos.

BY REV. W. FRITH.

THE second of the six visions is of an angel flying in the midst of heaven. Now, if we take this vision as in immediate chronological sequence, or at least with an interval not very prolonged, which the context would seem to suggest, it would teach that, after the removal of the first fruits, and just before the awful judgments on Babylon, and the personal Antichrist, there will be a special message from God, of evangelic import, which will be proclaimed to all the nations of the world, warning and inviting, as a last call to repentance. Possibly, this peculiar angelic Gospel corresponds with "the midnight cry" of Matt. 25: 6: "Behold the Bridegroom cometh, go ye out to meet him," a call to careless and "sleeping" saints (after the removal of the first fruits), to arise and prepare to meet their Bridegroom Lord. Perhaps it refers also to the time named in Acts 3: 19, 20, called "a season of refreshing from the presence of the Lord." The two events approximate, if they do not synchronise, as the context of each compared will show.

III. In verse 8th we have a further vision. Another angel is seen coming forth, and declaring the destruction of Babylon; the mission of this angel is declarative merely. Not that we consider that his mission comes after the actual destruction of the doomed city; but, because that which is about to take place in the divine purpose is spoken of as having already taken place; because perhaps of the infallible certainty with which all the divine purposes are executed in relation to the interests of Christ and his people.

IV. In verse 9 we have a further vision. An angel follows with a special cautionary mission; the time of this angel's mission and service we may fairly infer to be in the last half week of the personal Antichrist's terrible rule; because the message is a warning voice to those who live at that time, when the personal Antichrist is ruling, and the False Prophet is co-operating to insist on the worship of the image of the Beast, and the impressing the brand on those who refuse. Verse 10 declares the nature of the punishment which shall be inflicted by God on all who worship the Beast; and which, whether taken literally or figuratively, must import something indescribably terrible.

Verse 12 seems to refer to the noble army of martyrs, who shall suffer under the personal Antichrist. These are characterized by two special features:—1st. By keeping the commandments of God. 2nd. By exercising implicit faith in Jesus in those terrible times. Verse 13. Just at this point John hears a voice from heaven, pronouncing a special benediction over those who thus, as martyrs, die in the Lord; and declaring, under the Spirit's divine imprimatur, the final rest and blessed reward of those holy witnesses of Jesus.

V. Here, in verse 14, we have a new vision, grand and magnificent. As to time, if we take all details in their unbroken chronological sequence, which would appear to be natural, this vision presents the picture of those events which will at once supervene upon the slaughter of those who refuse to acknowledge the authority of the Antichrist and False Prophet; and so just before Jesus comes with his saints, to take vengeance on them who know not God, etc. The first object in the vision is a white cloud, and upon the cloud an august person, sitting as if enthroned in heaven, "like unto the Son of Man."

IN HIS HANDS

A NEW SERIAL STORY, WRITTEN EXPRESSLY
BY THE
REV EDWARD AUGUSTUS RAND
For the CHRISTIAN HERALD.

CHAPTER XLI. The Night Search.

IT was now still all about the spot where lay the unconscious officer and his equally unconscious defender. The shadows deepened. The pitying stars began to look down from their watch-towers in the sky. There was the gleam of lanterns here and there along the battle-field. They were hunting for the wounded. Ned and Melrose, though, were not discovered. They still slept in the slumber that is a sign not of a healthy renewing of vigor, but of its exhaustion. Ned stirred at last. From fact to fact in a slow, cruel progress his thoughts began to creep, that he was very stiff—that he had been wounded—and where was Melrose? He reached out his hand and touched a face.

"He is there," murmured Ned. He felt again.

"The face is warm. He is alive," thought Ned.

"Then he made an effort to raise himself on his elbow.

"Where's that hospittle?" he asked himself. Several clustered lights showed him where it was.

"I must git there, somehow," he said, "git him there."

Ned must do it for Janet's sake. His head began to droop, for he was weak.

"No, no!" he said, resisting the languor. "My, ain't I strong?"

He thought of the old days at home when he was the strongest of all the young men save Sandy. How he could row, lift, jump, wrestle!

"Yes," he said, rising, his great will bearing up his body, "I am strong, I am strong! I will carry him."

He stooped over Melrose tenderly.

"Come, old boy! You and I must git him! What? Rain?"

The pitying stars had all gone to sleep. They, too, had been wounded, and by a wind out of the east. Clouds filled the sky, and the rain began to drip.

"Come, old boy! Git your death o' cold here!"

"Disturbed by Ned's shaking, Melrose opened his eyes and said, "What?"

"It's rainin', and we must git into that house. Don't ye understand?"

"I'll try."

Ned whispered something. Melrose stirred almost violently.

"Say that again!"

"Try for Jennet's sake," came another and loud, distinct whisper. Melrose got upon his feet. That word "Janet" was food, water, medicine, fire to the wounded man.

"We'll try, Ned."

"All right. Let's shove ahead. Lean on me, Cap'n. How she's rainin'!"

If Ned had seen on his hands something wet that he felt on his blouse, he would have seen not rain but blood. It was a half-conscious, almost blind, despairing and dogged struggle toward three lights.

There were two, yes, two in a line, and above them was a third.

"Hos-spittle! Hum!" murmured Ned.

Leaning against one another, the two men moved forward, trembling, staggering, falling, rising again, then staggering, plunging on toward the three lights, two in a line and above them a third.

When Melrose faltered so long that it seemed as if he would halt for good, Ned whispered what he called his "magic-word." It was only one word, "Jennet!"

Then Melrose would struggle ahead again. Oh, it was a horrible, agonizing, pitiful, but brave, heroic struggle! Would it be successful? Would it be a battle ending in victory, or—death? Was it not the latter, for by-and-by, the two figures that had writhed in pain toward those three lights, one above and two below, ceased their contortions, and the wind moaned above them as if wailing, and the rain wept softly, ceaselessly, its sorrow on a confused, still heap. But there was a stir in the heap once more. It was Ned that moved and opened his eyes. It came to him little by little that he had been wounded, that he and Melrose had tried to gain that hospital and—"Where is he?" he murmured.

He reached out his hand. "There he is!" he gasped. "Thank God! In his hands! Yes, all in his hands! Haven't dropped out of 'em. No, and can't! Jennet said so! Jennet?"

For her sake he must get to that hospital. "Where is it?" he asked.

He raised himself on his elbow, and just ahead, burned softly, hopefully, brightly, the three lights.

To Ned's imagination, it seemed as if Janet shone in their midst and beckoned him.

"Must git there for her sake and git him thar," he reasoned.

"Him," though, was too exhausted to wake or even stir in response to Ned's solicitation.

"Then I must go alone. Must git help and bring him. And ain't I strong!" he thought.

To arouse his resources, he thought again how strong he had been in the field and on the sea, what feats he had attempted and accomplished. Sandy alone was a greater Hercules.

"Come! git up thar, you baby!" he called out to himself. "Show that you are strong!"

He started on his last pilgrimage, not rising to his feet, for he could not possibly do it now—but crawling slowly, painfully, yet determinedly, doggedly, beckoned on by the three lights.

"Nearer!" he said, "Gittin' nearer them lights, old boy."

Yes, the three lights, one above, two below, were bigger and brighter.

"Don't give up, old boy! Remember Jennet! He'll die out thar!"

It seemed as if he could reach up and touch those three lights so hopefully did they shine before the eyes of this crouching, crawling form, writhing down into hollows and out of them, over stumps, round the sides of bushes, and past the trunks of trees, till over the rough threshold of a door, he wrenched himself into the sight of the hospital.

And there rising up before him in what seemed "golden light," contrasted with the hideous blackness outside, presenting herself to his imagination as a very angel out of the presence of God, was Janet Morton herself.

"Oh, Jen-net!" he sobbed, the tears choking his utterance.

"Why, poor, poor Ned!" she shrieked. "Sandy! Sandy!" come quick.

Her arms went down to him and about him. It was Heaven to feel the touch of her hands, but Ned could not permit that caress.

"Quick!" he gasped. "Go—Winthrop—Melrose is—out—thar! Git a—lantern and men!"

He could say no more. The long struggle which to his mind seemed to have occupied weeks, was successful and his duty done so far as his poor, bleeding body could perform it, he rolled over on the floor unconscious. It was the end of a brave effort nobly done, the triumph of the will, like the rider of some finely bred horse which sinks exhausted in the moment that it reaches the goal. He had not been able to explain where Melrose was but the name had been enough to set Janet's pulses throbbing.

Leaving Ned to the care of the doctors and Sandy, who was gentle as a woman and strong as a horse, Janet accompanied by two men of the ambulance corps, carrying a stretcher sallied forth into the night. She carried a lantern and scrutinized every inch of road. She was not sure of the direction, but with a prayer for guidance she took the course that seemed to her the one most likely to be the one by which Ned had reached the house. The rain was still falling and there were marks in the mud that looked like the tracks of Ned's hands and knees. Following these she came at last to a heap by the side of the path, which might have been a stump felled and left where it had fallen, but which was not a stump but the body of a man.

How her hands trembled as she stooped and pushed aside the slouched hat that she might look on the face below! Yes, it was he. When last she had seen that face, it was bright and young and handsome. Now it was deathly pale, and there was blood and mud upon it, but it was his face. Janet's memory had enshrined it too tenderly to forget it now in this extremity; She touched it gently and with the new power that her nursing experience had taught her. It told her that he was living. Thank God it was not the face of the dead!

In His Hands.

e was unconscious, he might be dying, but there was life yet. How different was the meeting from the one Janet had pictured in her mind. She thought that she might see him in some crowded assembly, on some busy street; and she had imagined him unaware of her presence, or recognizing her with his old smile. But that was in her old home, when she sat in the gloaming and thought of him, before the cruel war had changed everything. This was the meeting after the long separation. She had never pictured anything like this. Who would have thought that when they parted in the sweet peace of the quiet village they would meet next on a battlefield amid the slain in the darkness and the shadow of death?

And this meeting—was it only the prelude of that long parting which would continue all through her life? It looked so, for though there was life, it trembled like a sick which might go out any moment. Janet realized then how much her own fate depended on this man. She had put in God's hands, but oh, how much heavier she would be if God would let her have him for a companion and protector. Well, he, too, was in God's hand and she was willing that it should be so. God knew best; it was a comfort to feel sure of this. She would do her duty as she saw it and would leave everything to God.

It moments were precious, too precious to be spent in reverie. Too much agitated to speak, she indicated to the attendants by motion of her hand, that this was the man she was seeking, and they placed him on the stretcher and bore him to the exteriorized hospital.

"Not her brother, I reckon," said one of the men to Sandy, who met them.

"Somebody closer than that," said Sandy, with the air of one who was in a position to know.

"Well," said the man, "whoever he is, he'll live for her sake, if she wants him; she's saved many a boy for his friends. She deserves to have her own."

"That's so," assented his comrade. "I never saw a young woman like she is, and such motherly ways. I've always thought the best nurse a man could have when he was real sick, was his old mother. Better than professionals, or wife or sister. The mother seems to know just what you want, and I did not think anybody could come up to that; but Nurse Morton fills the bill. Why she's had things from men who were going, that they never expected to breathe to a living soul. The way she looks after a man and bears with him when he's fretful and always knowing just how to fix him, it's the pain's a bit easier, and her sweet smile, and her being so glad if he's a bit better—why it seems like an angel to be bed and I guess it's better than that because of the human in her. Well if I lay down on one of these bunks, with a loaf Southern lead in me or a big gash that put me on the border, so I didn't know whether I was going under or not, and they said, 'Tom you can have anything on air you want,' I'd just say, 'Lene have Nurse Morton around, till I see rich way I'm going.' I tell you there's hundreds feel just that way, and them as don't are them as don't know her."

Sandy listened, delighted with the praise given by a stranger to his friend. "She comes from our town," he said proudly. "I've known her since I was a little."

"Well if your town breeds women like that we'd better get 'em all down here. This is a time when we could make 'em useful. But I reckon you haven't got any to reach her."

Sandy felt honored to hear these honest praises of Janet, but his heart was heavy. The doctors gave a gloomy report of him, whose hurt was worse than had at first been supposed. Sandy hovered about his bed as long as he could and when that called him away, he took the first opportunity of going to inquire after him. Janet, too, was very anxious. She told Dr. Percival something of his past life and begged him to do his utmost to save him. But in spite of all that was done Ned lost ground daily.

"Nurse Morton," said Dr. Percival, one morning as he and Janet met at the door of the hospital, "your friend Ned Davis is in a bad way."

"I was just going to see him," said

Janet. "He was asleep last night when I saw him and I thought he was looking sadly."

"Yes, I am afraid there is no hope," said the Doctor. "I am sorry, for he is a noble fellow. I learned from Captain Melrose that it was in looking after him that Ned got his wound. Ned refused to leave him when he fell and even after Ned himself was wounded, he would not desist from trying to help the Captain. Melrose believes he owes his life to Ned. But for Ned's efforts he would not have got within reach of help and it was Ned who put you on the track of him. A man like that is worth saving, but I am afraid he is beyond our help. I will wait till this evening, and if there is no improvement, I shall have to tell him. I expect it will be hard. A young fellow like that clings to life. It will be a heavy blow for him."

That night the Doctor pronounced sentence as he called it. Ned was told that he could not get well. "You must make up your mind for the worst, my poor fellow," said the Doctor. "You are going to die. Are you afraid?"

"Afraid!" exclaimed Ned. "No, Doctor, I ain't afraid. Jennet—that's Nurse Morton, you know—taught me we were in the Lord's hands. You don't suppose he is going to drop me now, do you?"

"Well, no, I shouldn't think he would if you want to nestle there."

"And I do, doctor! That's the word, doctor, 'nestle'! Thank ye! I'll go to sleep on that."

And as on a tired pillow, he rested his soul upon this word and went to sleep.

When he awoke he saw Sandy, who had begged permission to go to the hospital to inquire for his old friend. Ned's eyes sparkled when he saw him.

"Old boy!" he said and smiled.

Sandy wound his arm about Ned and cried behind Ned's back.

"Hark!" said Ned. "I hear the sea!"

Yes, he caught the melody of the waters falling on eternity's shore, an ocean we must all cross, but which we do not see nor hear until we get close down to its rim! Ned now heard it.

"Don't you hear it? Tide's a-comin', Sandy. Lovely, isn't it, Sandy! You can see the waves ar' comin' in, all in shinin' rows."

Sandy did not know what Ned was saying, for he was busily crying back of Ned.

"Why, here are folks, Sandy! And Sandy, there's mother! Jest as she used to look when she wanted to take dad's boat and go off."

In a moment, he asked, "Where's Jennet?"

"Here I am, good Ned, brave Ned, dear Ned," said the nurse. "We all love you, and you are a noble fellow."

Such happiness as shone in Ned's face! He lay awhile in silence, his eyes closed, his face in the sunshine of a great peace. He awoke once more, only once.

"Hark, Sandy, I hear the sea!"

"Fraid?" sobbed Sandy, wiping in secret two big red eyes.

"Fraid, old boy? Death that fetches us home, ain't an enemy to be 'fraid of. You and I 'fraid to put off? Sandy, Sandy—the bright waves—and 'tother side—"

The voice came slower.

"Over—there—"

It came softer.

"Is the King's—"

The eyes drooped.

"The King's Land. Ready—Sandy—to put—off."

The whisper died away, for a voyager all alone and yet not alone—for One was with him—had put off on the bright waters beyond which is the King's Land!

A Friend of the Children.

THE death of a very kindly, gentle lady who has alleviated much suffering and has been a pioneer in good work, is reported from London. Mrs. Marie Hilton, the founder of the famous Creche, has passed away after a life of service and usefulness. It is now a quarter of a century since this devoted member of the Society of Friends began the labor with which her name is identified. She found in visiting the poorer quarters of the city that through poverty, or widowhood, or other causes, there were many mothers who were obliged to leave their infant children at home, while they went out to earn a living by cleaning, or washing, or some other occupation. The temporary guardians of these infants were often mere children, and still more frequently indifferent girls who cared nothing for their charges. The wails of the neglected babies pierced the good lady's heart, and she set to work to plan a method of preventing the evil. She hired a large room in the most poverty-stricken quarter of London, begged a few cots from her friends, and undertook to take charge of all the babies that were brought to her. Ten infants and fifteen young children were brought the first day. Mrs. Hilton and her helpers took care of them, fed them, and kept them while their mothers toiled at their labor all day. That was the beginning of the Creche in London. It was a novelty then, but it met a need which no one seemed to have noticed. Now, there are "day nurseries" in all the chief cities here and in England. Mrs. Hilton continued this work to the last, opening new rooms in other quarters of London, and encouraging friends to begin such work in their own localities. It was a work of love, and the worker will be sorely missed.

An Asthma Cure at Last.

Medical science at last reports a positive cure for Asthma, the commonest of all diseases. A new and original discovery found on the Congo River, West Africa. Its cures are really marvelous. Rev. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, W. Va., writes that he cured him of Asthma, after suffering for many years, by using the Kola Compound. He writes: "I have been suffering from Asthma for many years, and have tried every remedy known to me, but have not been able to get any relief. I have been told that the Kola Compound was a cure, and I have tried it, and I am now cured. I feel like a new man, and I am able to do all my work as usual. I am very grateful to the Kola Compound for what it has done for me. A letter from Rev. Dr. L. E. HALL, an eminent Baptist Divine:

HATTIESBURG, MISS., Dec. 15, 1892.

Gen. E. C. Walthall, U. S. Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR GENERAL—I enclose you a pamphlet recently published by a company of gentlemen of New Orleans, who are developing the Stafford Mineral Springs Water. The wonderful efficacy of this water exceeds anything that I have ever known. If any of your friends are suffering from Bright's Disease, Diabetes, Cystitis, Dyspepsia, Nervous Prostration, Dropsy, etc., kindly inform them of the water. If I had not seen with my own eyes the wonderful effect of it on parties who were on the very verge of the grave; if I had not seen their complete restoration to health after every available remedy had been exhausted and life had been utterly despaired of, I would not venture to hazard my reputation for integrity and truth on its virtue, as I have.

Yours truly, L. E. HALL.

The Smallest Church of All.

It is at Fra Juana, in Mexico—The Oldest California Indian.

COMMENTING on a recent paragraph in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in which it was stated that the smallest church in the world was said to be at St. Lawrence, Isle of Wight, Rev. C. J. Miller, of Nes- Cal., writes us this interesting letter: I have the honor of being pastor of the church in the south-west corner of the OLD GABRIEL, WHO DIED AGED 151.

United States. We are in sight of the monument that indicates the division line between the Republics of Mexico and the United States. Our new church spire will be a monument indicating the division line between God's kingdom on earth and God's kingdom in heaven. We are all in sight of the great light-house on Pt. Loma. One question you answer in our paper, 'Where is the smallest church,' I would answer at Fra Juana, just over the line; it is about 16 x 20 feet.

Our crops are lost because of the hot, dry weather, and unless we secure outside help, we must postpone our building, or it must be abandoned for the present. This is a lemon country; our people have been at a continuous expense for two to five years in creating homes, but so far no home from them. They need a church, and have sacrificed much, subscribing over $50 toward a $1500 edifice.

Gabriel died at Salinas, Cal., at a very advanced age, believed to be over 151 years. He claimed to have been present with the first missionary to Alta California landed at Monterey in 1770, and that he was at the time a grandfather. Up to about four years ago there was at the County Hospital a Christianized Indian named Jose Lauriano, of the same tribe as old Gabriel, who stated that Gabriel was a very old man when he was a child. Lauriano was very old when he died. Old Gabriel was attached to the missions as a Christianized Indian. About 1854, he was allowed to occupy a small patch of land on the farm of W. S. Johnson, Esq., now

Japan's Creation Myth.

Like its neighbor, China, and other Asiatic countries, Japan is a land of many mingled religious beliefs, which, although they are usually divided into two or three great classifications, really constitute a large number of different faiths, some of them vitally distinct from others. One of the most interesting is the Omiki philosophy, which teaches the doctrine of the divine parentage, the brotherhood of man, and even intimates a future state. Omiki holds that the creation was the work of the great deity, Kuni-toko-tachi-no-Mikoto and his consort, Omotaru-no-Mikoto. When they appeared upon the stage, the world was one vast mud sea. The divine pair suffered from ennui and resolved to create man. On looking about for suggestions, they noticed the various fishes and reptiles, which in Omiki's teaching serve as representatives of the subordinate deities, and they determined to embody in the human form the various qualities which they fancied these inferior beings symbolized. Accordingly, Izanagi and Izanami-no-Mikoto were fixed upon as the parents of the race. In due time Izanami gave birth to 999,999 pigmies, six-tenths of an inch in height. In the course of ninety-nine years, these offspring grew to be four inches tall and then died. Later on she gave birth to a similar brood of pigmies, who grew to be five inches tall and then died. In this gradual increase of size, Izanami saw the promise of a race of full-sized men. Incidentally the lower animals came into being. After some generations, these rudimentary men were born in pairs.

THE DRAMA OF LIFE.

A Sermon Preached by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., at Washington, D. C., on the Text: Job 27: 23, "Men shall clap their hands at him and shall hiss him out of his place."

HIS allusion seems to be dramatic. The Bible more than once makes such allusions. Paul says: "We are made a theatre or spectacle to angels and to men."

It is evident from the text that some of the habits of theatre-goers were known in Job's time, because he describes an actor hissed off the stage. The impersonator comes on the boards and, either through lack of study of the part he is to take or inaptness or other incapacity, the audience is offended, and expresses its disapprobation and disgust by hissing. "Men shall clap their hands at him and shall hiss him out of his place."

My text suggests that each one of us is put on the stage of this world to take some part. What hardship and suffering and discipline great actors have undergone year after year that they might be perfected in their parts, you have often read. But we, put on the stage of this life to represent charity and faith and humility and helpfulness—what little preparation we have made, although we have three galleries of spectators, earth and heaven and hell! Have we not been more attentive to the part taken by others than to the part taken by ourselves, and, while we needed to be looking at home and concentrating on our own duty, we have been criticising the other performers, and saying, "that was too high," or "too low," or "too feeble," or "too extravagant," or "too tame," or "too demonstrative," while we ourselves were making a dead failure and preparing to be ignominiously hissed off the stage? Each one is assigned a place; no supernumeraries hanging around the drama of life to take this or that or the other part, as they may be called upon. No one can take our place. We can take no other place. Neither can we put off our character; no change of apparel can make us anyone else than that which we eternally are.

Many make a failure of their part in the drama of life through dissipation. They have enough intellectual equipment and good address and geniality unbounded. But they have a wine-closet that contains all the forces for their social and business and moral overthrow. So far back as the year 959, King Edgar of England made a law that the drinking cups should have pins fastened at a certain point in the side, so that the indulger might be reminded to stop when he had reached the bottom. But there are no pins on the sides of the modern wine cup or beer mug, and the great peril of the modern man is at the gravelly bottom of their own grave. Dr. Sax, of France, has discovered something which all drinkers ought to know. He has found out that alcohol, in every shape, whether of wine or brandy or beer, contains germs of life called bacilli. By a powerful microscope these living things are discovered, and when you take a drink you take them into the stomach and then into your blood, and, getting into the crimson canals of life, they go into every tissue of your body, and your entire organism is taken possession of by these noxious infinitesimals. When in delirium tremens a man sees every form of reptilian life, it seems it is only these parasites of the brain in exaggerated size. It is not a hallucination that the victim is suffering from. He only sees in the room what is actually crawling and rioting in his own brain. Every time you take strong drink you swallow these maggots, and every time the imbibor of alcohol in any shape feels vertigo or rheumatism or nausea it is only the jubilee of these maggots. Efforts are being made for the discovery of some germicide that can kill the parasites of alcoholism, but the only thing that will ever extirpate them is abstinence from alcohol and teetotal abstinence, to which I would before God swear all these young men and old.

America is a fruitful country, and we raise large crops of wheat and corn and oats, but the largest crop we raise in this country is the crop of drunkards. With sickle made out of the sharp edges of the broken glass of bottle and demijohn they are cut down, and there are whole swathes of them, whole winnows of them, and it takes all the hospitals and penitentiaries and graveyards and cemeteries to hold this harvest of hell. Some of you are going down under this evil, and the never-dying worm of alcoholism has wound around you one of its coils, and by next New Year's Day it will have another coil around you, and it will after awhile put a coil around your tongue and a coil around your brain and a coil around your lung and a coil around your foot and a coil around your heart, and some day this never-dying worm will with one spring tighten all the coils at once, and in the last twist of that awful convulsion you will cry out, "Oh, my God!" and be gone. The greatest of dramatists in the tragedy of "The Tempest" sends staggering across the stage Stephano, the drunken butler; but across the stage of human life strong drink sends kingly and queenly and princely natures staggering forward against the footlights of publicity and then staggering back into failure till the world is impatient for their disappearance, and human and diabolic voices join in hissing them off the stage.

Many also make a failure in the drama of life through indolence. They are always making calculations how little they can do for the compensation they get. There are more lazy ministers, lawyers, doctors, merchants, artists, and farmers than have ever been counted upon. The community is full of laggards and shirkers. I can tell it from the way they crawl along the street, from their tardiness in meeting engagements, from the lethargies that seem to hang to the foot when they lift it, to the hand when they put it out, to the words when they speak.

Two young men in a store. In the morning the one goes to his post the last minute or one minute behind. The other is ten minutes before the time and has his hat and coat hung up, and is at his post waiting for duty. The one is ever and anon, in the afternoon, looking at his watch to see if it is not most time to shut up. The other stays half an hour after he might go, and when asked why, says he wanted to look over some entries he had made to be sure he was right, or to put up some goods that had been left out of place. The one is very touchy about doing work not exactly belonging to him. The other is glad to help the other clerks in their work. The first will be a prolonged nothing, and he will be poorer at sixty years of age than at twenty. The other will be a merchant prince. Indolence is the cause of more failures in all occupations than you have ever suspected. People are too lazy to do what they can do, and want to undertake that which they cannot do. In the drama of life they don't want to be a common soldier, carrying a halberd across the stage, or a falconer, or a mere attendant, and so they lounge about the scenes till they shall be called to be something great. After awhile, by some accident of prosperity or circumstances, they get into the place for which they have no qualification. And very soon, if the man be a merchant, he is going around asking his creditors to compromise for ten cents on the dollar. Or, if a clergyman, he is making tirades against the ingratitude of churches. Or, if an attorney, by unskilful management he loses a case by which widows and orphans are robbed of their portion. Or, if a physician, he by malpractice gives his patient rapid transit from this world to the next. Our incompetent friend would have made a passable horse doctor, but he wanted to be professor of anatomy in a university. He could have sold enough confectionery to have supported his family, but he wanted to have a sugar refinery like the Havemeyers. He could have mended shoes, but he wanted to amend the Constitution of the United States. Towards the end of life these people are out of patience, out of money, out of friends, out of everything. They go to the poorhouse, or keep out of it by running in debt to all the grocery and dry goods stores that will trust them. People begin to wonder when the curtain will drop on the scene. After awhile, leaving nothing but their compliments to pay doctor, undertaker, and Gabriel Grubb, the grave-digger, they disappear. Exeunt! Hissed off the stage.

Others fail in the drama of life through demonstrated selfishness. They make all the rivers empty into their sea, all the roads of emolument end at their door, and they gather all the plumes of honor for their brow. They help no one, encourage no one, rescue no one. "How big a pile of money can I get?" and "How much of the world can I absorb?" are the chief questions. They feel about the common people as the Turks felt towards the Asapi, or common soldiers, considering them of no use except to fill up the ditches with their dead bodies while the other troops walked over them to take the fort. After awhile this prince of worldly success is sick. The only interest society has in his illness is the effect that his possible decease may have on the money markets. After awhile he dies. Great newspaper capitals announce how he started with nothing and ended with everything. Although for sake of appearance some people put handkerchiefs to the eye, there is not one genuine tear shed. The heirs sit up all night when he lies in state, discussing what the old fellow has probably done with his money. It takes all the livery stables within two miles to furnish funeral equipages, and all the mourning stores are kept busy in selling weeds of grief. The stone-cutters send in proposals for a monument. The minister at the obsequies reads of the resurrection, which makes the hearers fear that if the unscrupulous financier does come up in the general rising, he will try to get a "corner" on tombstones and graveyard fences. All good men are glad that the moral nuisance has been removed. The heirs are glad because they get possession of the long-delayed inheritance. Dropping every feather of all his plumes, every certificate of all his stock, every bond of all his investments, every dollar of all his fortune, he departs, and all the rolling of Dead March in Saul and all the pageantry of his interment, and all the exquisiteness of sarcophagus, and all the extravagance of epitaphology cannot hide the fact that my text has come again to tremendous fulfillment: "Men shall clap their hands at him and shall hiss him out of his place!"

You see the clapping comes before the hiss. The world cheers before it dares. So it is said the deadly asp tickles before it stings. Going up, is he? Huh! Stand back and let his galloping hies dash by, a whirlwind of plated harness and tinkling head-gear and arched alk. Drink deep of his Madeira and co. Boast of how well you know him. All hats off as he passes. Bask for days and years in the sunlight of his prosperity. Going down, is he? Pretend to be astonished so that you cannot see him he walks past. When men ask you if you know him, halt and hesitate as though you were trying to call up a dim memory and say, "Well, y-e-es, yes; I believe once did know him, but have not seen him for a long while." Cross a different way from the one where you used to meet him lest he ask for financial help. When started life he spoke a good word for him at the bank. Talk down his credit so that his fortunes are collapsing. Hide his name on two of your notes; tell him that you have changed your mind about such things, and that you never intend. After awhile his matters come to a halt, and an assignment or suspension or sheriff's sale takes place. You say: He ought to have stopped sooner. Just I expected. He made too big a splash in the world. Glad the balloon has burst. "A-ha!" Applause when he went up, silent derision when he came down. "Men shall clap their hands at him and hiss him out of his place." So, high up amid the eagles the eagle flutters dust into the eyes of the roebuck, which then, with eyes blind, goes tumbling over the precipice, the antlers crashing on the rocks.

Now, compare some of these going out of life with the departure of men and women who, in the drama of life, take the part that God assigned them and then went away honored of men and applauded of the Lord Almighty. It is about twenty years ago that in a comparatively small apartment of the city a newly married couple set up a home. The first guest invited to that residence was the Lord Jesus Christ, and the Bible given the bride on the day of her espousal was the guide of that household. Days of sunshine were followed by days of shadow. Did you ever know a home that for fifty years had no visitation? The young woman who left her father's house for her young husband's home started out with a parental benediction and good advice she will never forget. Her mother said to her the day before marriage: "Now, my child, you are going away from us. Of course, as long as your father and I live you will feel that you come to us at any time. But your home will be elsewhere. From long experience I find it is best to serve God. It is very bright with you now, my child, and you may think you can get along without religion, but the day will come when you will want God, and my advice is, establish a family altar, and, if need be, conduct the worship yourself." The counsel was taken, and that young wife consecrated every room in the house to God.

Years passed on and there were in the home hilarities, but they were good and healthful; and sorrows, but they were comforted. Marriages as bright as our blossoms could make them, and burials in which all hearts were riven. They had a family lot in the cemetery, but all the place is illuminated with stories of resurrection and reunion. The children of the household that lived have grown up and they are all Christians, the father and mother leading the way and the children following. What care the mother too of wardrobe and education, character and manners! How hard she sometimes worked! When the head of the household unfortunate in business she sewed until her fingers were numb and bleeding at the tips. And what close calculation of economy and what ingenuity in refitting the garments of the elder children for the younger, and only God kept account of the mother's sideaches and headaches, an heartaches and the tremulous prayers by the side of the sick child's cradle and by the couch of this one fully grown. The neighbors often noticed how tired she looked, and old acquaintances hardly knew her in the street. But without complaint she waited and toiled and endured an accomplished all these years. The children are out in the world—an honor to themselves and their parents. After awhile the mother's last sickness comes. Children and grandchildren, summoned from afar, come softly into the room one by one, for she is too weak to see more than one at a time. She runs her dying fingers lovingly through their hair and tells them not to cry, and that she is going now, but they will meet again in a little while in a better world, and she kisses them good-bye and says to each, "God bless and keep you, my dear child." The day of the obsequies comes, and the officiating clergyman tells the story of wifely and motherly endurance and many hearts on earth and in heaven echo the sentiment, and as she is carried off the stage of this mortal life there are cries of "Faithful unto death;" "She hath done what she could," while empowering all the voices of earth and heaven is the plaudits of the God who watched her from first to last, saying, "Well done, good and faithful servant; thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many things; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord!"

What became of the father of that household? He started as a young man in business and had a small income, and having got a little ahead, sickness in the family swept it all away. He went through all the business panics of forty years, met many losses, and suffered many betrayals, but kept right on trusting in God, whether business was good or poor, setting his children a good example and giving them the best of counsel, and never a prayer did he offer for all those years but they were mentioned in it. He is old now and realized that cannot be long before he must quit all these scenes. But he is going to leave his children an inheritance of prayer and Christian principles which all the defalcations of earth can never touch, and as he goes out of the world the Church of God bless him and the poor ring his door-bell to see if he is any better, and his grave is surrounded by a multitude who went on and stood there before the procession of dirges came up, and some say, "There will be no one to take his place," and others say, "Who will pity me now?" and others remark, "He shall be held in everlasting remembrance." And as the drama of his life closes, all the vociferation and amusements and encores that ever shook the theatres of earthly spectacle were so feeble and feeble compared with the long, loud thunders of approval that shall break from the cloud of witnesses in the piled-up galaxy of the heavens. Choose ye between the life that shall close by being laid off the stage and the life that shall command acclamations supernal and archangelic.

Men and women on the stage of life, many of you in the first act of the drama, and others in the second, and some of you in the third, and a few in the fourth, and here and there one in the fifth, but all of you between entrance and exit, I quote to you the peroration of this sermon the most suggestive passage that Shakespeare ever wrote, although you never heard it read. The author has often been claimed as infidel and atheistic, so the quotation shall be not only religiously helpful to ourselves, but grandly vindicatory of the great dramatist. I quote from his last will and testament:—

In the name of God, Amen. I, William Shakespeare, of Stratford-upon-Avon, in the county of Warwick, gentleman, in perfect health and memory (God be praised), do make this my last will and testament, in manner and form following: First, I commend my soul into the hands of God, my Creator, hoping and assuredly believing through the only merits of Jesus Christ, my Saviour, to be made partaker of life everlasting."

Australia's Loss.

Death of Sir Henry Parkes, the Grand Old Statesman of New South Wales.

NE of the most remarkable men that the world has seen in this generation is now numbered with the dead. That his name was but little known in our own land is a fact, but his character and career were of the kind that we as Americans hold in high honor, and we cannot withhold a tribute to his memory. In 1815 his father was working as a day laborer in the fields of the little Warwickshire village of Stoneleigh at three dollars a week, out of which he had to pay the rent of his cottage and support his wife and family. In that year a child was born in the humble home to whom the name of Henry was given. If that child had been like other children born at that time under such circumstances, he would have remained in the village, beginning life by going into the fields at ten years old to frighten crows from the growing crops, gradually rising through the regular gradations to a ploughman or carter, earning three dollars a week, and then as he grew older earning less and less until in his old age he died in the county poor-house. That has been the career of thousands all over England who were born as he was. But this boy was not of the ordinary pattern. When he died a few days ago, he had been five times premier of the great colony where he made his home; there was scarcely a law on the statute book that had not been placed there by his efforts; a grateful country tendered him a state funeral, which offer he had foreseen and enjoined his family to decline; and, still more remarkable than all, with abundant opportunities for accumulating a large fortune, and though he had controlled the collection and expenditure of vast sums of public money for a quarter of a century, he lived and died a poor man. He was known as, "The Incorruptible" and he deserved the title, for there was no surer way to failure, under his administration, than for the political schemers, who swarmed around the government of the colony, to try to win his favor by rendering him, or offering him, personal advantage. All his thought, all his prodigious energies, all his persistent labor were given to promote the welfare of his colony, and he sought nothing and would take nothing for himself.

Parkes was twenty-four years old when, poor and unknown, he landed in New South Wales. He found the honest settlers vainly protesting against the practice of the English Government of sending its convicts to the colony to work out their sentences. The new arrival earned his living in various humble ways for several years, but found time to lend his aid to the agitation against the great convict grievance. He soon became known as a clear thinker and an eloquent speaker. During the following ten years, the agitation continued, for after the practice of sending convicts was ostensibly abandoned, the sheep farmers succeeded in getting several ship-loads of criminal laborers, under the name of assigned-servants. It was not until 1849 that Parkes and his friends saw their persistent labors finally crowned with success. The next object of the band of patriots in which Parkes was now a recognized leader, was to get a constitution for the colony. That was secured in 1855, and in the new Parliament elected under it in the following year, he had a seat which with a few brief intervals he held until his death. His influence increased from year to year, until in 1872, he was at the head of the administration. From that time until 1889, when he became Premier for the last time, he was the leader of the party of progress and honesty in public affairs. But he had grave defects as a Parliamentary leader. He was austere and unsocial and consequently made few friends. The people trusted him and almost idolized him, but in the House he was dreaded rather than liked. Cold and logical and utterly destitute of personal magnetism, he led a lonely, troubled public life, but one in which his intense patriotism was conspicuous. He was active and vigorous, even after he had passed his eightieth year, and at his death the great colony he so faithfully served followed him to the grave with lamentation and sincere sorrow.

Devoured by a Crocodile.

IN a recent letter, Rev. J. A. Clarke, a missionary on the Upper Congo, Africa, gave a sketch of a young man named Bwala, who, having learned to read and write, was employed in the printing office, and worked patiently and perseveringly, and took great interest in his work. "He was married, and on one occasion his wife went across the river to visit some friends. In order to see her, he started across the river, which was about three miles wide near the station, in a very small canoe. As he was sitting at the stern of his canoe a crocodile came up, seized him, and carried him off. The natives found the canoe with a piece bitten out of it, and came and told us. The poor wife, on her return, was almost frantic with grief." Next morning some of the natives came to Mr. Clarke saying, "May we have the mission boat to go down the river and look for Bwala? A woman has dreamt that we should find him alive."

Mr. Clarke consented, and gave one of the natives who was a good shot, a rifle and some ammunition, and his colleague went down the river with them. They saw the crocodile on an island. They shot at him and wounded him, and he then dropped the remains of poor Bwala; his head and shoulders only were complete. The crocodile, which was found to be seventeen feet in length, was killed, and they put him into a canoe with the remains of their friend. The heathen had said that the crocodile was bewitched, and could not be killed, and their astonishment was great when they saw the contents of the canoe. Bwala's widow afterwards became a Christian convert.

A Trying Chinese Climate.

A missionary writes that "the Yangtze Valley is the most trying place on the globe. If one gets sick he must get out at once, otherwise he will die. The mercury stands at ninety-eight or one hundred degrees during the day. At night it falls a degree or two. Mosquitoes get too languid to bite. People must sleep under punkahs or not sleep at all. New arrivals will not take advice. They know more than the veterans. They propose to show them a more excellent way. As a result, many get sick and go home or die. It does not pay to live below a certain standard. To do so is almost sure to impair health, to diminish usefulness and to shorten life."

In an Arab Slaver's Den.

Nearly 600 Wretched Captives Liberated when Chief Mlozi's Town was Taken.

HE Wankonde—a native tribe, who occupy territory at the north end of Lake Nyassa—have for a home one of the finest countries to be found in Africa. Great mountains, blue lakes, deep clear rivers, and rich soil, with great groves of bananas, and an abundance of oil palms, tamarinds, fig, and other fruit-producing trees, make it a desirable land to live in. Some travelers have compared it with the glowing pictures of Eden, given by ancient writers. The Wankonde speak a singularly pure Bantu, and are exceedingly primitive. They have suffered greatly from the incursions of Arab slave-dealers, and at different times hundreds of their people have been kidnapped.

When the town or stockade of the Arab chief Mlozi was recently raided, a large number of slaves—about five hundred and ninety-six—were found cowed up in the place. They were nearly all captives from the Wankonde villages. They were practically prisoners, although permitted the use of their limbs. Men, women and children—all ages and both sexes—were mingled in the heterogeneous crowd. They seemed emaciated and half starved. After being cared for a few days they were set at liberty and returned to their own country.

Mr. Wm. M. Morrison, for two years a missionary artisan at Livingstonia, Nyasaland, who had returned on account of failing health, he is now in Chicago, recuperated, and anxious to be again used in Africa, if possible under the League. He writes:

That slavery yet exists to an alarming extent in Africa is a question of which there can be no possible doubt. During the two years I worked at the North End of Lake Nyassa, I had ample opportunity to observe this. Mlozi, the great Arab slave-trader did all in his power to hide it from the eyes of the few white men who were then in that part of Africa. I shall never forget how, on one occasion, about November, 1892, Mlozi determined to capture two or three hundred slaves from a village near the little European settlement Karonga. Under the sham pretence of making the white men believe that he did not engage in the slave trade, he brought a lot of his men down from the hills and prepared a midnight raid on a village whose people were both harmless and defenseless. These raiders stayed away from the village until midnight. When everything was quiet and still, every man having in the meantime been instructed to attack a certain house; at a given signal, every raider rapped at his victim's door, at the same time calling out gently the evening salutation, "Salihi gogoniri!" Thinking some visitor had called, the inmates soon found themselves the victims of a cruel and brutal deception. The thought of a white man but a short distance off seemed to give them some hope, and a few of them resisted; but only with this result that the light of a new day found one hundred and eighty-four men, women, and children—dead or dying around the deserted village. The raiders took with them about three hundred slaves. Filled with indignation, the white people at Karonga vowed revenge on the slayers of their friends, and calling in all their best native men, they armed them and set off in hot pursuit of the raiders. At sun-down they came upon them resting on the shores of the Lake. Fortunately, the poor slaves, though firmly tied to each other, were sitting some distance away from their captors. The rescuers made a full charge into the midst of the raiders. Three volleys were fired in quick succession, and before the raiders could realize it, about half their number lay dead. The remainder fled to the bush, which was soon after set on fire. Some, it is believed, did escape, but many perished. The three hundred slaves were brought back in safety to their own village.

Mr. Finlay, the white man who led the attack against the raiders, and brought back the rescued slaves, was almost worshipped thereafter by the poor natives. This is but one instance out of many that might be related. In those days (1892), it was a common occurrence to see from two to five slaves passing daily through our village in charge of some Arabs. Frequently in agony of soul I have turned my eyes away from these wretched scenes of inhumanity, realizing my utter helplessness.

To me, at least, it seems as if this Christ-like organization, the Philafrican Liberator's League, is the beginning of an answer to a multitude of prayers, from Him who doth according to His will in the armies of heaven and among the inhabitants of the earth. So, therefore, from my heart I say: "God bless the Philafrican Liberator's League."

Every passing week adds to the strength and popularity of the new Philafrican Liberator's League. Already many readers of this journal have applied for membership, grateful to be associated in so noble a work with the distinguished philanthropists who are identified with the League and its management. Contributions to aid in the work of the League and all inquiries or applications for membership should be sent to Heli Chatelain, Room 511, United Charities Building, Fourth avenue, New York. Contributions for the same purpose can also be sent to the proprietor of this journal.

Sunday School Lesson for June 7th. Luke 22: 24-37. Golden Text, Philemon 2: 5. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

FROM the time that Jesus had said to Peter upon the confession of his faith in him as the "Christ, the Son of the living God," "Thou art Peter, and upon this rock will I build my church," Satan provoked his fellow disciples to jealousy. Again and again the question arose among them which should be the greatest, and this terrible contention occupied them even in those solemn moments when Jesus broke the bread and gave them the wine to drink which should in the future be done in remembrance of his broken body and his poured out life-blood which were to be the true nourishment and life power for his body the Church. It is a terribly solemn fact that, from the moment when this question first arose in the little company of the apostles, took place in their life and ministry: we hear no more of their healing the sick or casting out devils, from this time until Christ had suffered and the Holy Ghost had been given. Their power had left them, the same spirit which led Adam and Eve to desire the forbidden fruit that they might be as gods knowing good and evil, (Gen. 3: 5) that, in fact, they might be great, had entered into the disciples; it was a spirit from beneath and not from above. And how then should they, who sided with Satan, cast out Satan? How should they who were sick in their inner man heal those who were sick in their outer man?

At the same time they failed to understand their Lord, and a significant reticence made them afraid to ask him, when with these thoughts of greatness in their hearts he had taken them aside to teach them the great lesson of the cross (Mark 9: 30-32). Human nature always wants to be great, and to take the lead; it chooses out "the uppermost rooms at feasts, and the chief seats in the synagogues, and greetings in the markets (tokens of respect), and to be called of men, Rabbi, Rabbi." (Matt. 23: 6-8). Human nature loves to assert itself and to have its rights, and its position recognized, it cannot live without recognition, it must needs be "seen of men." And it was not until after the disciples had left all and followed Jesus, after they had "cast out many devils, and anointed with oil many that were sick and healed them," (Mark 6: 13), that they must learn the evil of their own natural hearts, and learn to hate and renounce themselves as well as all else that they might know the life and power of Christ dwelling in them when the Holy Ghost should be given. Like Job, they could go the length of leaving all earthly things to follow Jesus. But the satisfaction which they formerly had had in their possessions was now transferred to their work and, like the seventy, they had said in their hearts, "Lord, even the devils are subject unto us through thy name." (Luke 10: 17). Themselves they had not renounced and they must learn a bitter lesson when they were

Jesus asked them a question which they were ashamed to answer, "What was it that ye disputed among yourselves by the way?" (Mark 9: 33.)

was who should be the greatest, they had given up all except themselves, that which the Lord most desired, and from that time until this solemn moment at the last supper, their rights and their dignity occupied the disciples, choking their spiritual understanding and robbing them of their spiritual power. Must it go on to the very end? Jesus knew what was in their hearts. He who had said, "The Son can do nothing of himself;" "I can of mine own self do nothing," (John 5: 19-30), did not expect of the disciples what even his untainted human nature could not produce. He did not lose patience, he understood the situation, and explained to them the difference between human and divine greatness. He did not deny that there should be a superiority in the kingdom of heaven but it should be quite another from that which was filling their minds, it could only be in an age to come when one of them should not be exalted above the other, but they should together reign in his kingdom.

The kingliness of those who should reign in his kingdom is manifest now in their power to take a place in which self is denied. The lowest place is the place of victory, the servant's place is the place of power. "I am among you as he that serveth." Yes; at that moment, only a few hours before his crucifixion, he was serving them who were wounding him to the quick! O, the forbearance of that hour! Three years and a half he had lived his holy, lamb-like life before them; they had been with him night and day, they had heard his teaching, the last meal he should ever take with them before his sufferings was over, the sacrament which was to shew forth his death till he come (I. Cor. 11: 26) was just instituted, and instead of being united with him in all which filled his heart, there was among his chosen witnesses this unseemly, disgraceful strife which should be the greatest. And he did not lose courage; "having loved his own which were in the world, he loved them unto the end" (John 13: 1), and in the mightiness of that love he leaves on one side all his personal feeling and does not say a word of his disappointment in them, but speaks a word of encouragement. "Ye are they which have continued with me in my temptations; ye have not left me when other disciples went back (John 6: 66). Ye have continued with me while men have sought my life, and I appoint unto you even as my father appointed unto me, that ye may eat and drink at my table in my kingdom, and sit on thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel." A kingdom indeed; but not now; suffering, humiliation, shame now, but glory hereafter. "If we suffer with him we shall also be glorified together." (Rom. 8: 17). Simon Peter was undoubtedly the leader in the mutual strife, as he was in most things, and therefore was the special mark for the attacks of Satan. And the Master, at such a moment, though near to his own sufferings and death, can calmly survey the situation of his disciple. To human eyes it looked as though Peter and all the disciples were very far fallen back from the glad time when sickness and evil spirits fled from before their ministry, and with joy and power they testified to the coming kingdom of their Lord. But Jesus as Man had been also a disciple to his Father (Isa. 50: 4, R. V. margin), and he had learned of him how to speak a word in season to them that are weary. He spoke words which should be understood later when the Holy Ghost was come. "Simon, Simon, behold Satan hath desired to have you that he may sift you as wheat: but I have prayed for thee that thy faith fail not, and when thou art converted (or turned again), strengthen thy brethren." Little did Peter know when he replied, "Lord, I am ready to go with thee to prison and to death, that his fall was so near. But one whose heart is set upon being great, one who has still in his heart to compare himself with others to their disadvantage, one who can renounce all else, but not his own rights and his own position, has for the attacks of the enemy. Satan did his worst when he so overcame Peter that he denied his Lord with oaths and curses; but he who sees the end from the beginning, saw beyond the fall of his servant, and knew there should be ultimate victory. He had asked and obtained it of his Father. Peter must be allowed to fall, or he would never learn that in him there dwelt no good thing, and that all the warm fervor of his heart's love to Jesus would break down under a test; no hand but the hand of God can keep a fallen creature.

SIFTING WHEAT.

WITH a mind oppressed with dread of his approaching sufferings and death, Christ came with his disciples to the upper-room in Jerusalem, to celebrate the great annual feast of the nation. That he had a human horror of the ordeal, it is easy to see from several incidental remarks that he let fall, as well as from his prayer in the garden, that if it were possible the cup might pass from him. But he had desired, as he said, to eat this last Passover with the disciples making it his farewell meal. What it commemorated and typified is fully described in Exodus 12: 14-13: 10. It was the event of the Jewish year and was a very solemn season. Judas had already made his arrangements for the betrayal; therefore he knew of the impending crisis, but the others appear to have had no idea, in spite of Christ's warnings, that danger was at hand. The dispute about precedence, which Luke mentions, probably arose about the position of the disciples at the table, as it was customary to range the guests at a feast in the order of their rank. They may have been the more anxious on the subject, because their position at this formal meal might be regarded as an indication of their degree of rank in the kingdom they were expecting Christ to establish. Christ appears to have allowed them to settle the matter for themselves. He was probably too sick at heart to care to interfere in so wretched a dispute, at such a time. Within a few hours, as he knew, he would be arrested like a felon, brutally beaten and cruelly executed. On the threshold of such events, a wrangle about places at the table must have been torturing to his agitated soul. But he would not for their sakes leave them unproved. When the dispute was adjusted, and they had taken their places at the table, Christ gave them an object lesson in humility by washing their feet, a duty which was usually performed by the lowest servants. Having resumed his place at the table, Jesus explained the meaning of what he had done. Luke gives his explanation without mentioning the previous incident. Briefly, it was that what he had done was an example for them. In his kingdom, in which they were so anxious to have high places, the principles of precedence were the reverse of those in worldly kingdoms. Not he who ruled, but he who served, would be accounted greatest. The greatest would be he who had most of the spirit of his Master, who had just taken on him not only the form but the duties of a servant. Thus the way to greatness in his kingdom lay, not in seeking honors, but in rendering service; not in selfishly striving to gain the best places, but in self-forgetfulness, and in humbly trying to be of service to others and to promote their happiness.

Leaving this subject, for the time short, he proceeds to something of practical importance. He warns Peter of his approaching fall and tells him that he has prayed for him. He knows that he will be restored, and when that occurs, there is a special duty for him to do. He strengthens others. Out of his sad and shameful experience would come a lesson and a duty specially his own.

Christ gives a general warning. He tells the wants of the disciples had been abundantly supplied. When they went without money and without even for their day's food, they had nothing, but now the conditions had changed. When their Master was drawn they must use ordinary means for their own maintenance and protection.

When thou art converted, strengthen thy brethren. This, at first sight, seems a strange injunction to give one who was about to be so conclusively proved; but experience shows its wisdom. In a certain mission where many disciples were reclaimed, there was one particularly active. When a man was induced to sign the pledge, Tom, as he was known, would make friends with him, try to win his confidence. He would call on him as he came home from work, especially on pay days and walk home with him, chatting cheerfully all the way. He would go to his home with some new book or paper and spend the evening with him. If he could get a holiday, he would take the opportunity to go to the country, and keep him from becoming gloomy and depressed. Tom seemed to know by instinct when a man was about to be tempted to drink, and would try to hand to help him keep his good resolution. In this way he helped the converts through crises, and did more good than any other workers. Yet Tom was not on the committee, nor did he hold any office. He was not a member of a church. He was he then? He was a Christian who had fallen into the sin of drunkenness, and had repented. There was no drunkard fighting his enemy and trying to resist temptation, who had not Tom's sympathy, and could have his help by leaning on him. That was the way he strengthened the brethren.

That he may sift you as wheat. This process of winnowing in Oriental countries was to toss the wheat into the air, and the grain fell to the ground and the chaff was blown away. Christ used the simile to describe the process of Peter's trial. His self-confidence, his boastfulness, his impulsiveness, were the prominent traits of his character. Satan appeared, and Christ's remark, to have thought that he was the whole of his character and that there was no solid grain of love and fidelity in him. When the wind of temptation struck him and he denied Christ, he was sifted as wheat. His self-confidence was blown away like chaff, but the love of the Lord remained true grain and the sifting process only made him more humble.

I am among you as he that serveth. This is told of a young man who had won a distinction at a Scottish university and had been called to the pastorate of a wealthy church, that he went to call a poor member who was sick. He went in his carriage and entered the house with some haughtiness. The old lady who had no servant called to him to "come by the back door." The young preacher, who thought he was being treated uncivilly, said: "I am the servant of the Lord and have come to speak with you about your soul's concerns." "Aye, aye," said the old Christian, "the servant of the Lord. Then ye'll be humble like your Maister."

He that hath a purse let him take it. When Paul went on his great missionary journeys, he was in different circumstances from those of the disciples who worked during the Lord's lifetime. In the changed conditions he worked to support himself. He had occasion to use the sword and we do not think our Lord in his injunction to buy a sword, meant it to be taken literally. Paul used such means of protection as he had, when he insisted on his rights as a Roman citizen, and compelled the magistrates at Philippi to make public apology for their cruelty. Missionaries in our day have therefore a perfect right to claim protection of their own governments as citizens while they are working for the extension of the kingdom of Christ. On the same principle Christians at home are justified in using their rights as citizens to promote righteousness in government.

OUR ARMENIAN COLONISTS.

Exiles who have Left their Native Homes and Settled in America—Fresno's Successful Armenian Colony—Room and a Welcome for Thousands More.

AN ARMENIAN VINEYARD IN CALIFORNIA.

GREGORIAN CHURCH.

FRIENDS of Armenia throughout the Union are busily engaged discussing the new aspect of affairs, looking to emigration on a large scale from that unfortunate land. Wherever the project is considered it finds many staunch supporters. Its advocates point to the fact that there are at the present time in America, thousands of natives of the ancient Eden, who have, in almost every instance, proved acceptable citizens, successful merchants and capable, self-supporting artisans or tradesmen. Many who have lately come hither to escape the persecutions at home, have for many months past been the sole dependence of dear ones left behind, to whom they have regularly sent remittances through the missionaries. Some have lost relatives in the massacres. All, without exception, would welcome any movement that had for its object the rescue of their friends from the Turk and Kurd, and their permanent settlement in a section of the globe where they could live at peace with all mankind and follow undisturbed the Christian faith of their fathers. Whether this desirable result is to be reached by emigration to Russia, Persia, Cyprus, some of the British colonies or the United States, time alone must decide.

Among the Armenian settlements in this country, the colony at Fresno, California, is an illustration of what can be accomplished by the Armenian peasant, who succeeds in reaching this land of freedom and religious liberty. Nowhere else has the vitality of this remarkable race, and its capacity to meet the requirements of American citizenship, been so conclusively demonstrated. This is so strictly a fact that even the national clannishness, which begets colonies, has been wiped out. The French, the Mexicans, the Portuguese, the Scandinavians, the Russians of Fresno, have their peculiar hotels and town-quarters, but the Armenians of Fresno live among the American population, in all respects on equal terms, and take the earliest opportunity of acquiring the English language and American citizenship. Of all the foreign nationalities they are probably the most popular in Fresno County among the Americans of native birth.

Fresno County has a large mixed population, following almost of necessity from the diversity of its products. The culture of the grape has attracted large numbers of Spanish, Portuguese, French, Dalmatian, and Italian settlers. On the other hand, the agricultural interest has brought over Danes, Swedes, and Hollanders. Among these people the Armenian immigrant of fifteen years ago was like the new boy just come to school. Everyone wanted to see what he was. At the present time, the Armenian has succeeded, even in the hardest times Fresno has ever encountered, in making his way, wherever industry, pluck, and marked sobriety were qualities to be appreciated. There are young Armenians in Fresno to-day who speak English perfectly, ally themselves in many sports with native American youths, and are enrolled members of the National Guard of California. True, these young men have only been in the country five or six years, but they have emulated their predecessors in the desire to become American citizens in fact as well as in name. Out of the 200 or more members of the Armenian colony in Fresno city and county, there is not one adult male, over five years in this country, who has not been naturalized. Many of the younger men have married American wives, and have proved themselves model husbands.

There is not a single pauper or dependent Armenian in the county to-day.

Most of the emigrants brought little with them, but all have prospered. Among the first Armenian citizens to come to Fresno were the two brothers, John and Joseph Seropian. It is over sixteen years since they commenced business there as merchants. The Seropian brothers are credited with making the first effective attack on the railroad monopoly in that part of California and rendering the great San Joaquin Valley Railroad a possibility. They did this by shipping a consignment of dried fruit from their own factory all the way to San Francisco, two hundred miles, by mule team. Others followed the example and, under these auspices, a competing railroad was developed that means an unexpected future for the San Joaquin Valley, in a territory three hundred miles in length and scarcely one hundred in width, with some of the finest land in the world.

Among the permanent members of the local Armenian colony is the Rev. Avedis Vartanian, who usually conducts the services in the hall, which the majority of the Armenians use as a place of worship. Most of them are members of the Congregationalist Church and, until about two years ago, they regularly attended the services of the First Congregational Church of Fresno, with their American brethren of the same denomination. Rev. Mr. Vartanian was born at Bitlis, in 1844, joined the Congregational Church in 1861, and after a few years' study in Bitlis, was sent to Havadorig, near Sassoon (the scene of the great massacre), as teacher and preacher. In 1873, he came to America, and after five years' residence returned to his native land. He stayed at Havadorig eight years longer, leaving a congregation of two hundred members. At the present time Mr. Vartanian besides his pastoral labors, is engaged in farming, having a twenty-acre vineyard and ranch near Fresno. As instances of the sterling qualities of the Armenian race, and its capacity for development, no better examples can be found than the brothers, Haig and Horen Patigian of Fresno. Three years ago these lads had little money and few friends. Their genius as artists had received scarcely any cultivation. They left Armenia five years ago, and settled in Fresno with their parents. Horen, the elder, is twenty-two years old; Haig is twenty-one. Horen received some hints in art from a San Francisco artist who readily recognized the youth's talent. Meanwhile Haig worked hard to master the trade of a sign-painter. Both are now doing well. Horen's specialty being illustration, while Haig is skilful at the brush. The two lads, by their unaided efforts have almost gained a monopoly of the sign-painting and advertising designs in the city and county. Both speak English fluently and are respected by the community.

Matthew K. Giant is another fine example of the capacity of the Armenian youth in a country which offers freedom for development, religious, mental and physical. He is a young man with a talent for oratory. When in his native country, he attended the Armenian Mission College at Aintab. He came over when quite young, was graduated from the Williston Seminary in Massachusetts, and on coming to Fresno, began business as a jeweler. Dr. A. J. Melchion is among the older Armenian residents, and is now traveling through California and the Western States as a lecturer on the Armenian question. Melchon Markarian, who came here from Moosh, farms twenty-five acres of vineyard near Fresno. His brother who has been here about seven years, is engaged in the jewelry business, and has an excellent reputation. It may be stated as a fact that the general reputation of all the Armenian residents here, old and young, men and women, is an enviable one. Paul H. Azadian, a jeweler, and his partner, Gabriel M. Michaelian, are prosperous and excellent citizens. Abraham Sergius owns a

A few of the old-time Armenian settlers in Fresno worship in the Union Church on the old Gregorian lines. The primitive Armenian Church, it will be recalled, resembles the Greek Church very closely in its canons. The Russians and the old Armenians get along very well so far as religion goes, but in other respects the distinction is marked. The Russian population of Russia-town is unprogressive and frankly brutal or even serf-like, while the Armenian, even of the more conservative class, is in direct line with civilization and progress. The younger Armenians have established a branch of the Armenian Society in Fresno, and have a hall with a library. Their talent for pageant and decoration was well shown at the last Fourth of July parade in Fresno, when the Armenian display distanced all competitors.

The occupation of vineyardist has commended itself to some of the Armenian population of the county and they have held their own where scores of their American and English neighbors have failed. The Armenian does his own work chiefly, if not entirely, so that even in the hardest times he can make a small profit out of his raisins. Among the Armenians owning or operating vineyards in the vicinity of Fresno are J. and H. Azdarian, who farm eighty acres, P. Arachelian, 40 acres, N. B. Peters, 20 acres. The brothers Nishkian, are leading fruit dealers.

These are but a few of the names of Fresno's Armenian colony. It suffices to add that the majority are God-fearing, Christian men and women; law-abiding and progressive to a remarkable degree, and that no nationality has shown a more marked aptitude for acquiring American ideas, or a greater capacity for self-government.

A Missionary's Peril.

The late Rev. Dr. Van Dyck of Beirut, Syria, was widely known throughout a great region of country as "El Hakin"—the doctor. He went to Syria from New York as a missionary physician, and soon became so fluent in the speech of the Arabs that it came near costing him his life. At first he adopted the native dress, but during an outbreak between the Maronites and the Druses, as he was returning one night from a visit to a patient, he was seized by a band of marauders, who were about to assassinate him. He protested that he was an American, a physician who had been in attendance on one of their own men, but his Arabic was too perfect—they did not believe him. As a shibboleth, they asked him a question, the answer to which involved the mention of a certain bridge. His unhesitating answer was near being his death, for they dragged him from his horse, declaring that no foreigner could pronounce that word. Dr. Van Dyck, however, insisted on being taken before the sheik, and his manner was so impressive that his demand was granted. The sheik recognized him and sent his late captors home with him as a guard, but warned him never again to wear native dress—he was too good an Arab!

The Shah's Riches.

Nasr-ed-deen, the late Shah of Persia, left to his successor an enormous fortune. The treasures he heaped up are of incredible richness. His diamonds, rubies, and pearls are of unheard-of splendor, and in such quantities that a visitor saw in the presses where they are kept European decanters and tumblers filled with them. Nasr-ed-deen liked them to be in transparent vessels, so that he could rapidly see if the bulk was notably diminished by a thief. He had a big aquarium-glass case filled with nothing but carefully-sorted pearls of the finest Oriental lustre.

LEADERS OF FRESNO'S ARMENIAN COLONY

IN MENELIK'S KINGDOM.

Abyssinia's War to Repel Italian Invasion—An Ancient Nation, Nominally Christian—Theodore the Tyrant, and his Successor.

THERE is probably no other part of the great African Continent where the conditions of life are more favorable, the climate more genial, and the picturesque aspect of nature more pronounced than in Abyssinia.

GEN. BALDISSERRA.

It lies to the south-east of Nubia, and its southern boundary is a branch of the Nile. Its population of about four millions was a mixed race, originally, but long ages have fused them into a united people with many strong traits of character. These Abyssinians may be called, not inappropriately, the Swiss of Africa, their country being one of the most mountainous on the globe, and their physique uniformly magnificent. Their general cast of features more nearly approximates to the Bedouin than any other type, although a large proportion is said to be of Caucasian lineage. Their features are regular, hair and eyes black and the complexion dark olive. Religiously as well as racially they are a mixed people. There are some who are idolaters, still more are Mohammedans, and very many are Christians, adhering to the original faith of the Abyssinians. It is variously claimed that a large colony of Jews who have been settled in a certain district for an unknown period, came thither from Palestine in the days of King Rehoboam, and others affirm that they are the offspring of fugitives who settled there after the destruction of Jerusalem. Christianity was introduced into the country in the Fourth century, but the Christianity of the present time has little vitality. Its forms and ordinances conform to the rules of the Greek Church. Although there is no image-worship, they have many pictures of saints whom they venerate almost to the point of adoration. Christianity is degraded and is mingled in confusion with many Jewish observances that have been inherited from the Semitic ancestors of the present Abyssinian nation. At the head of the state religion is a bishop, or abuna, who is selected and consecrated by the Coptic patriarch of Alexandria. The laws are based on the Roman code of Justinian.

Everywhere—in its arts, traditions, buildings, language, religion, and social customs—does this country, once popular and powerful, show evidences of retrogression and decay. It is said to have been a great nation long before the Christian era, and both Menelik and Taoti, his Empress, claim lineal descent from King Solomon. In the sixth century, A.D., the empire extended to the shores of the Red Sea, and down into the heart of Southern Arabia; but ceaseless warfare with Moslem invaders and hostile native African tribes greatly weakened the power and reduced the territory of the empire. Amid all vicissitudes, and notwithstanding all the changes that have taken place in the political and religious aspects of the nation, the Abyssinians to-day claim recognition as a Christian people, and their comparatively enlightened monarch, the Negus, in almost every state document that passes through his hands makes due reference to the ancient and historic faith.

There are three great divisions in the Empire: 1. Haile, a kingdom of which Adowa and Antola are the principal towns; 2. Gondar or Amhara, another kingdom to the west, with the city of Gondar as its capital; and 3. Shoa, a third kingdom, of which Menelik was ruler before he became Negus of the whole Empire. Shoa is the most powerful and best organized of the three states and its capital, Ankobar, with ten thousand inhabitants, is pleasantly situated on a plateau at eighty-two hundred feet elevation. Most picturesque of all the Abyssinian cities is Gondar, already mentioned. There Menelik resides with his Court in the Imperial Palace shown in the colored illustration on the first page of this issue—which is a remarkably accurate representation of the royal residence. In the time of the late King Theodore, this splendid palace, known as the "Negus-Ghimp," was allowed to fall into disrepair. It is related that the mother of Ras Ali, a famous Abyssinian ruler, incensed at her own unpopularity with her subjects, directed that large sections of the palace be taken down, declaring, "Since we cannot leave any monument of our own power, it is unnecessary to leave that of others." This Amazonian woman, who commanded her own armies in battle, was wounded by a young soldier of fortune and being captured, gave the royal city of Gondar as a ransom. Her captor subsequently became King Theodore, the ruler of Amhara, and, later, of all Abyssinia. His reign was a succession of wars of conquest. Even after the annexation of Shoa and Tigre, there were constant rebellions, some of them instigated by European influence. Theodore was a veritable tyrant. It was recorded of him in 1867, that out of three million inhabitants he had destroyed more than a third by war, famine, and murder. Europeans in his country, including missionaries and consuls, were imprisoned and threatened with death. His conduct was the cause of the British expedition under Sir Robert Napier, which defeated his armies, captured Magdala, his stronghold, and finally ended in his ignominious death. Theodore's successor on the throne was Prince Kassa, his cousin, whose reign was almost as turbulent as that which preceded it. The country remained closed to missionary effort. Kassa was crowned in 1872, assuming the name of King Johannes. His successor, Menelek, has proved a most sagacious and temperate monarch, and has become exceedingly popular with his subjects. This result is largely due, it is said, to the cleverness of the Empress Taoti, who is evidently far in advance of other women of royal station in that part of the world.

Many of the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are already familiar to some extent with the causes that led to the present war in Abyssinia. As far as the Abyssinians themselves are concerned, their attitude may be characterized as one of patriotic defense. They had no special quarrel with any European nation of late years, but it has long been apparent to the Negus and his councillors, that the great struggle for colonial supremacy in Africa now going on among the European Powers must inevitably involve their country, and they made preparations on an extensive scale to resist any attempt at invasion. They had not forgotten, however, the territory they had lost in former wars. They looked intently toward Massowah, which the English had handed over to the Italians, and the latter had made their military stronghold. It is now ascertained that long before the Italians took their first aggressive step in the direction of Menelik's dominions, that sagacious monarch had his armies in readiness and well equipped, with modern rifles and a strong commissariat. It was certainly a startling surprise to the Italian generals to find opposing them in the field disciplined troops, with all the advantage of greatly superior numbers, abundant food, and an intimate knowledge of the country.

Menelik, it will be remembered, by a treaty made with Italy in 1889, placed the country under an Italian protectorate. Early in 1895 a scientific mission from Russia left Constantinople for Abyssinia, its avowed object being scientific exploration and the effecting a closer union between the Russian and Abyssinian Churches. In June the Negus sent a mission to St. Petersburg, and in the following month diplomatic agents of each country were appointed at St. Petersburg and in Abyssinia. The result of this interchange of courtesies was to encourage Abyssinia against Italy. Then followed the campaigns of 1894 and 1895, which resulted in the occupation of Kassala, and the capture of Adigrat. Recent severe reverses to the Italians have, however, changed the whole situation. At the present writing, the invasion has received a set-back that seems conclusive although Gen. Baldisserra, the new Italian Commander seems to still hope for success.

England's latest Nile campaign has been undertaken for the purpose of subjugating the dervishes, who, acting as the allies of Abyssinia, threaten to wrest Kassala from the Italians. Kassala is the key to the Soudan from the east, and it is all important to English interests that it should remain in European hands. If the dervishes and Menelik's armies should succeed in driving out the Italians, they might then be encouraged to act in conjunction against British interests on the Nile and the borders of the Soudan; hence, to create a diversion of the dervish strength, England is pushing forward military operations along the Nile as rapidly as possible from Wady Halfa to Dongola and southward. A protracted and highly important campaign may be expected in that historic region. The outcome may yet prove to be the opening up of new and valuable territory to civilizing and Christianizing influences.

White Brutality in Africa.

Seldom has anything more inhuman in the way of punishment been conceived than the methods adopted by some white officials and traders in Africa. The London Christian says: "The dark deeds of white men in Africa will probably be disclosed at the trial of Captain Lothaire for the murder of Mr. Stokes. It is a horrid imagination, or a still more horrid fact, that one officer in the Congo State required a thousand hands as a penalty for failure to collect enough ivory or india-rubber. Mr. Leon Decla affirms this in an article in The New Review. For the sake, therefore, of their good name, if not for the sake of the poor natives, the Belgian Government will have to enforce a fair trial without resorting to trickery."

Arrested by a Voice.

WHEN Rev. J. Russell, of Bradford, England, was in the prime of his manhood, he had a voice of such power and volume that it could be heard at a distance of nearly half a mile. In the neighborhood of his preaching station he lived a notorious wife-beater, poacher, and burglar, named Joe Bradley. One evening

WADY-HALFA, A BRITISH MILITARY POST ON THE NILE, EGYPT.

Bradley set out from his home with the intention of burglarizing a certain residence. He suddenly heard a distance voice and curiosity prompted him to follow the sound for half a mile, until he found himself on the outskirts of a crowd, listening to earnest words of Gospel appeal. An hour later, as Rev. Mr. Russell was sitting at his evening meal, a knock was heard at the front door, and the servant announced that Joe Bradley wanted to see him. As once he went to the door. There at the open doorway stood the sturdy figure, and a gruff voice asked, "Are you Mr. Russell?" "Yes, I am. Do you know me?" "Yes, Joe, I do." "I want you to come for a walk with me." Together the preacher and poacher walked in silence until out of the town and up a lonely lane between two high hedge-rows. Then Joe came to a sudden halt, and said, "You know what my life has been. I started out on an errand of burglary this evening. As I crept along the river bank, a voice fell on my ears. Scarcely knowing what I did, I walked till I came to a crowd and heard you preaching. I afterward inquired your name and address, that I might see you. I want to know whether all you have said is true." "Yes, Joe, every word." "Then do you think there is an hope for me? Can Jesus save such a sinner as I am?" "Yes, Joe, I have no doubt about it whatever, seeing he can save to the uttermost!" "But though you know much of my life, you don't know it all. There is hardly a sin under the sun I have not committed; I should not like to swear these hands have not been stained with blood. Can there be mercy for such a deep-dyed sinner?" "Yes, Joe; the blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanseth us from all sin!" "Then I want you to see me bury these things, and kneel with me upon their grave."

Cutting the turf carefully, he dug a little grave, and deposited there his revolver, jimmy, skeleton keys, and sundry house-breaking appliances. Then, treading the earth down, he re-laid the turf, and he and the preacher knelt in the darkness, crying to God for mercy. As they rose, Joe left Mr. Russell, and was heard of in the place no more.

Thirty years passed by, and Mr. Russell was at a gathering of Sunday School children in Bradford, when a well-built and neatly-dressed gentleman gripped his hand. "Why, Mr. Russell, I am delighted to see you!" "You have the advantage of me," said Mr. Russell. "Don't you know me? I know you, and have reason to know you. Don't you remember Joe Bradley?" "You are not Joe Bradley, are you?" "I am; but, praise God, I am not Joe Bradley as you knew him. I love the Lord, and have been preaching his Gospel for years; and (turning to a lady at his side) this is Mrs. Bradley; she also loves God; and my three daughters are all Christians. Forget you? never! We must forever praise God that we knew you."

THE AFRICAN SEAT OF WAR.

The Girls of Upper Sheckem.

BEFORE mother came to Upper Sheckem to live, the place was very different from what it is now. But that was thirty years ago. Then there were lots of young people in the place, and something was going on all the time, frolics, and fun, and junketting, church socials, and pleasant parties, courting, and marrying. Everything's changed, and Upper Sheckem isn't what it was. Of course, the river's here yet, and the hills, and the breezy pastures, and the orchards, where the blossoms wave like flying snowflakes, are here, but the young people all away. There are only old folks and little children. The boys went first, to seek their fortunes in the towns or across the continent, or somewhere beyond our mountains, and the girls staid at home and grew old here, at least that's how it used to be, but now they'll all go, boys and girls, for the type-writers, and saleswomen, and clerks use up our country girls with their demand, and Upper Sheckem's just a lonesome place."

All the time that Araminta Lucas was telling me this, she was busy with her work, which was very pretty and interesting. She was making a braided rug, and she had bits of blue, and red, and brown, and yellow wool, which she was twisting and out, with the aid of a needle which she used for the purpose. She was not much of a girlhood herself, but she had a settled own and prim look, the air of a woman who has been always kept under the sway of mothers with stronger wills. Presently her mother, a brisk woman of fifty, with a bright, energetic manner, and sparkling, black eye, came bustling into the big, sunlit kitchen.

"For goodness sake, Araminta," exclaimed Mrs. Lucas, "put away that everlasting rag, that you keep pottering with, and go over to the church and lend a hand there. We're to have a reception to-night," she went on turning to me, "to our new minister and his wife."

"I am glad you have a pastor settled here at last," I said, for year after year as I had visited Upper Sheckem I had seen the white church on the hill, standing with closed windows and doors, and had observed an absence of reverend Sabbath-teaching in the village which was both sad and surprising.

"Yes," said Mrs. Lucas, "We're thankful to have him, and you know he's part of a home missionary. We pay what we can raise, and the Board in the city makes the rest, I don't know whether Mr. Greene's much of a preacher, but he's got a good face, and a hearty nice way with him, and his wife, she's just sweet. Now Araminta, you just hurry up, and take a slice of cake with you when you go. Betsey Martin squeezin' lemons when I left."

A long time had passed since they had enjoyed anything social in Upper Sheckem. After tea, in the long May twilight, the country wagons came in from the outlying districts, from Middle Sheckem, West Sheckem, Old Sheckem, Sheckem Centre, and Lower East Sheckem. From the centre the various Sheckems radiated like the spokes in a wheel, and twice a day the finest little ramshackle train you ever saw, rumbled on its leisurely way and stopped at each of them, dropping a mail-bag, and perhaps a little freight for the local store. Now and then it carried a few passengers, and these were not impatient of its slow progress through the beautiful hills and valleys, as they were generally elderly people who had time at their disposal, not hurrying men and women who could never wait for anything, and wanted to travel by express.

I went to the social, and I met Mr. Greene. I expected to see a middle-aged man. I found a tall, slender, eager-faced boy, not long ordained, and evidently only lately married to the delicate and pretty young lady in the modish spring gown, who was gracefully receiving her husband's new parishioners.

"Well, you've come to a dead'n alive place, Parson," said one good old Deacon. "What you expect to do here?"

"I expect to fight Apollyon," was the resolute answer. "I see he has some outposts in this community and I'm going to give his forces battle."

"Meaning old Slocum's inn, I s'pose," said the Deacon, with a twinkling eye. "What boys there be here, get ruined at Slocum's, but he's a sly old fox, and I don't believe you can get the best of him."

"I can try."

"And God will help you," said a dear old lady standing by.

The first thing the new minister did was to organize a Christian Endeavor Society, into which largely he induced to band themselves for sisterly work, the girls of Upper Sheckem. All unmarried ladies under forty and over fifteen were enrolled, and as many of the young married people as could be persuaded to join them, with the growing boys, an important element which had been snubbed or ignored or antagonized, but never until now, approached with cordiality and utilized as valuable.

Dead and alive as Upper Sheckem was supposed to be, it stirred to life, and found the life interesting and even exciting, under the influence of the new minister and his wife. There was something going on at the church every day and every evening; what material was there, was put to work, and far and near, farms and outlying homes were visited, and invitations given to join the company of the busy church-people at Upper Sheckem.

"I tell you," said Jimmy Breeze, as he drove the village stage from the station, our minister's a hustler, and no mistake."

With the falling off of his trade at the inn, the old tavern-keeper was very ill satisfied. He had boasted that he kept an orderly road-house, and he was proud that no scenes of violence ever took place within its doors. Wives and mothers in the several Sheckems would have told another story, if they had been interviewed, for many a sad heart and many a disappointment came from the lingering of sons and husbands in that spot. The girls of Upper Sheckem opened a counter attraction in the shape of a pleasant little reading-room where coffee and crullers were served for five cents, and one could get a glass of lemonade or milk as he chose, for two or three cents.

Araminta Lucas said to me one day: "Ma says times are turning back again to their old ways, and really now that Mr. Greene has drawn them out, we find that there are young people here, as well as in other places. We used to think they had all emigrated, but there are some left."

"Enough left to do something in the Lord's army," I said with a heart that rejoiced and gave thanks. For the way to accomplish anything whatever in this world, is to do it, and not merely to talk about it. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Progress in Siam.

The Once Heathen Nation Rapidly become Civilized — Christianity Extending.

LIKE Korea, the ancient Asiatic kingdom of Siam has profited by its misfortunes. Lately the struggle between Britain and France for supremacy in Siam has been the means of materially reducing the territory of King Chulalongkorn, as much of it has been absorbed by those two nations. But a wonderful change is now taking place in the entire kingdom. The people seem to have been awakened from a long sleep and are now actively adopting the methods and even to some extent the dress of Europeans, and are building railroads and telegraphs, and developing industries in the central provinces. Large numbers of Chinese and Japanese are colonizing in newly-opened rice-growing districts. Our illustration on this page shows what a personal interest the King and his Court are taking in the new order of things. At the opening of the Nagara-Rajasima Railroad, the monarch — who is the principal share-holder — presided at the ceremonies, attended by the leading princes, nobles and officials, and a number of Europeans. King Chulalongkorn, wearing the scarf which is a Siamese badge of royalty, can be distinguished in the group of courtiers and others who throng the car, which is just about to start. He had never before had the opportunity of making so long a journey by rail, or, indeed, of seeing much of the portion of his dominions through which the railway passes. Those who accompanied him on his trip were no less amused at the astonishment of the little princes and princesses, at their father's side.

Buddhism is the natural religion of Siam, and the temples reared to the worship of the heathen gods are almost innumerable. Demon-worship prevails to a very large extent throughout the kingdom. Christian missions have been in operation in Siam for many years, under the Baptists, the American Board, the London Missionary Society, and later, the American Presbyterians. Only lately, however, has any marked favor been shown to the missionaries. There are now a number of very prosperous mission stations, with schools, churches and a steadily increasing body of communicants. There are also in connection with the missions, industrial schools, boarding-school and hospitals. Under the present regime, and with the new civilization which is dawning in Siam, the prospect for successful Christian work is now brighter than ever.

A Brave Armenian Prelate.

The Gregorian Armenian Bishop of Oorfa, Mgr. Khoren Mekhitarian, a witness of the extermination of his pastoral flock, sent to beg the authorities to make the massacres to cease, offering his own life as an expiatory sacrifice. Not having succeeded in appeasing the rage of these lunatics, and mad with grief, he opened of himself the main artery of his arm, and then he sent afresh his entreaties to these same authorities, telling them that already his blood was flowing, that he was dying, and that he entreated them, for the last time, to have pity on the poor Armenian people. These monsters, still immovable, instead of putting an end to the carnage, contented themselves simply in sending to the house of the bishop the municipal medical officer, who hastened to do the necessary bandaging to stop the bleeding, and to bring to life the poor old man, already fainting, and who was bathed in his blood.

My Prayer.

"For thy name's sake lead me and guide me."

COME to Thee, O Lord of love,
And fervently my heart doth pray,
For Thy name's sake, O take my hand,
And guide me in life's tangled way.
So weak I am I need Thy strength
To hold me in the trial hour,
That faith fail not, that Thou wouldst keep My soul by Thy all loving power.

While I am still upon the earth
Give me celestial vision bright,
A confidence that naught can shake
In Thy eternal world of light.
Some token of Thy presence give,
That I may know the Lord is nigh,
May feel Thy nearness and Thy love,
When dark and cloudy days go by.

Oh, let me covet earnestly
The best of gifts,—the highest prize,
My heart's devotion prove to Thee,
By service and by sacrifice.
Still lead me through dark waters deep,
Thou who didst come from death to save,
That I may look by faith in Thee
Through the closed bars of silent grave.

Berlin, Mass.

—PHEBE A. HOLDER.

Florida's Vanished Race.

THERE have been found in Florida the relics of a comparatively civilized race of people who lived there long before the days of Columbus. They were fishermen and traders by sea, maintaining a commerce with the West Indies and Yucatan. That they were a very numerous population is proved by the mounds of oyster and other shells which they have left behind. These are by far the largest shell mounds in the world, and the making of them must have required many centuries. The mystery is how the people were effaced, for there is no evidence that they survived as late as the first coming of the whites.

In several respects these people were different from any known Indians; but the most notable point about them was their method of living in houses over water, and elevated on piles. The region occupied by them was the west shore of Florida, southward of Tampa, and the outlying islands. That part of the coast of the flowery peninsula is very irregular, with numerous islands and points of mainland. There are numerous mounds which vary in size from two hundred yards to half a mile square, and the depth of the molluscan remains in places is as much as thirty feet. The vestiges of thousands of houses are found on the shell heaps. They seem to have been constructed in the simplest fashion, on small platforms of logs upheld by piles driven into the mud. Beneath the mud were old coral reefs, so that the foundation was fairly secure. The people depended for food almost wholly upon what they could get from the water, and their diet consisted mostly of shellfish of various kinds. The mounds are composed chiefly of oyster shells, but also contain immense quantities of the shells of other species of mollusks, such as clams, mussels and scollops. The shells of big conches are especially numerous.

Indians are more nearly omnivorous than whites. Depending on such food for subsistence, these prehistoric fisher folk found it most convenient to live on the shore. Their pile-supported dwellings kept them out of the wet and afforded some degree of safety from attack. As fast as they ate the oysters they dropped the shells into the water beneath, and thus, in the course of time, the accumulations rose to a level with the platforms. Finally, the houses came to rest upon the shell heaps directly, and in the latter are buried the relics of generation after generation.

Barbarity of War.

INDIAN tribes may scalp Indian tribes, and African horde may massacre African horde, and Asiatic jungle may be reddened with the fight of Asiatics, but let us hope that intelligent nations may be about through with bloodshed, and that treaty will be substituted for bayonet, and as the most useless thing in all the earth is a dead man, the art of killing will become obsolete, and hate and revenge and vindictiveness and cruelty will descend to their native place and the prison gates close on them with prolonged reverberation. On a large scale, or small scale, as God may call us, let us do our part toward hastening the consummation. By word, by deed, by cheerful look, by earnest prayer, by sympathy, by lives devoted to the best things in the best way, we may all be felt; and though our names may not once be mentioned on earth among the workers for the grand result, God will recognize us and ask us to take part in the final jubilee celebrative of a world emancipated and a world redeemed. There was a pathos and a beauty worth commemoration in that which the Irish woman in Boston said to the priest at the time moneys were being raised for the relief of starving Ireland. She brought $100 for the relief fund. The priest, with tears in his eyes, said: "You can't afford to give $100; better give half of that." "No," she said, "send on the hundred. I shall feel happier if I give a hundred to the suffering people of my native land." Opening the subscription book to make record of it the priest said, "What is your name?" "Never mind the name," she replied. "Send on the money; God will know the name!"

Stop Groaning.

THE nation is not going to ruin, as evil prophecy ever and anon declares. These times are dull and disastrous as compared with the better times about to dawn. None of God's wheels move backward. Providence makes no retreat. The command resounding through the ages is, "I will, and it shall be done." This is not the sentimentalism of a sanguine nature, but the oath of the God of a hundred Bible promises. If this country, in one century of republican institutions, has taken a pathetically equal position that had ten and fifteen centuries ago, the start of us, what may not the next two hundred years accomplish for this country? I may say that the future is rather gloomy to us. I very much differ with you. Is there no satisfaction in planting a tree for unborn generations to rest under? He who has no interest in the welfare of the future centuries is not worthy to enjoy the advantages which have been planted five hundred years, nor appreciative of a redemption which was launched two thousand years ago, or nearly that. As politicians, as patriots, as Christians, we do well to pitch our tent toward the sunrising.

Martyrs of the Pen.

ONE of the hardest ways to earn a living is to write for the press, and daily our sympathies are stirred! Let no one enter the field of literature for the purpose of "making a living" unless as a very last resort. There are thousands of persons to-day starving to death with a steel pen in their hand. The story of Grub street and poets living on thin soup is being repeated all over this land, although the modern cases are not so conspicuous. Poverty is no more agreeable because classical and set in hexameters. The hungry author cannot breakfast on "odes to summer." On every cold day how many of the literati are shivering! Martyrs have perished in the fire, but more persons have perished for lack of fire.

Why They Are Taken.

HEAVEN must be populated. There is not so much room on the Western prairies and table-lands for more settlers as there is room in the upper country for more people. Heaven has only one want, and that is of greater population. It is sparsely inhabited yet, as compared with its future citizenship. The crowns are not half taken, nor the robes half worn. Heaven is like a house in which a levee is to be held at ten o'clock. At nine o'clock the rooms are all ablaze with lights, and the servants, gloved and vested, are waiting to open the doors. The rooms of our Father's house are illumined, and the chamberlains are ready, and the table is spread. A few have entered, but heaven is not yet fully begun. They have only sung the opening piece.

Now, how shall God fill up his house except by subtracting from this world? The continent of heaven is to be peopled from the surrounding islands. If so, I can understand why God should take a young brother rather than some of his comrades not half so useful, and my sister, rather than a thousand women who are of no Christian service.

Why, in almost all cases it is the loved one of the family that is transported. Heaven wants the best. Why should not the great capital of the universe have the pick of everything? The half-and-half Christians will get into glory, but they need to be kept here a good while yet for polishing. Those who are ready God takes. The earlier inhabitants of a place make the greatest impression upon its future character, and so heaven ought to have the best first.

Besides that, if there were a shipwreck and you went out with a life-boat, and you find some of your friends clinging to the hulk, you would be apt to take them ashore first. God seems to set his especial love on some; and when he finds them shivering amid this world's temptations and sorrows, he first lifts them out of the breakers.

Oh, weep not for the Christian dead! If they go through long sickness, in which there is opportunity for parting admonition, thank God for that. But if by sudden transition, and they have not a moment of consciousness, thank God that they escape the exhaustion of sickness, and that from the health of earth they stepped into the health of heaven.

Monday Rest.

WHILE on Sunday most people rest, the pastor works. Monday ought to be to him the day of rest. The Monday feeling sometimes comes to the ministry because that is the day the clerical profession do what they call "odds and ends," and visit the sick. Instead of taking it easy that morning, they are worried about the many errands they have to do. Monday is a poor day for visiting the sick. It is bad for the minister and the invalid to whom he goes. When I am sick, save me from a minister who himself has "the dumps." We need to be strong when we go to help the weak. What the sick most need is a dose of sunshine; and how shall we pour it out for them unless we have a steady hand? There is no use of going in to sit on the bedside and help the invalid groan. Better take to him your tuning-fork and give him the pitch of "the new song." Do not spend Monday in rushing about. "Odds and ends" have killed many a minister. Sunday is a trying day; let Saturday on one side of it, and Monday on the other side of it, take hold its arms and help it through. Do not spend Monday in going round to see "how the sermon took." If it was faithful, I warrant that in some quarters it did not take at all. Do not ask a child afterward whether he enjoys calomel and jalap; of course he does not.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

F. Wells, Philadelphia, Pa. What are the comparative figures of the modern European armies?

Russia, 868,772; France, 598,263; Germany, 584,784; Austria, 354,252; Italy, 252,829.

Mr. J. A. McNabb, of the Houston (Texas) Jail Mission, writes us to say that the Hospital referred to in our issue of May 6th as the scene of evangelistic services, is not the Prison Hospital, but the Stuart and Boyles Railroad Hospital—a different institution.

D. H. Rupp, Charleston. Where, and under whose pastorate, was Robert Moffat, the African Missionary, converted?

He had a Christian home, but it was not until he had left his home in Scotland to go to a position at Warrington, in Cheshire, England, that the reading of the Bible, the preaching of an excellent pastor, and the influence of a mother's prayers, resulted in Moffat's conversion. The name of the pastor is not known.

C. H. K., Sterling, Ark. To what did our Lord refer Luke 20:17 in speaking of the stone that the builders rejected?

Probably to a Jewish legend of the building of the Temple, which ran that a certain stone beautifully sculptured was sent from the quarries to the site of the Temple, but the builders did not know where it was to be placed. It did not seem to fit anywhere. They thrust it aside as useless and during the progress of the building, it lay in the valley, dust and dirt accumulating upon it. But when King Solomon came to view the progress of the work, he was very angry. He wanted to know why the stone which he had sent to connect the Eastern tower with the wall had not been placed in position. Then the builders thought of the rejected stone. It was found and cleansed and put in its place and was the chief ornament of the building. Christ compared himself to this rejected stone.

Mrs. A. M., Farnam, Neb. 1. Will God hold us responsible for wicked thoughts, when we fight against them and pray for strength to overcome them? 2. Is there danger of our loving our dear ones too much? How are we to know if we love God more than our families? 3. Does God ever create anyone with the intention from the first that they shall be lost, like Pharaoh, Esau, and Judas? 4. Is it wrong for Christians to dread the end of the world, and wish that it might not be just yet? 5. Have the prophecies in Rev. 12:6 yet been fulfilled? 6. Why do God's people think now that the end of time is near?

1. Not if you sincerely strive to repel them, and hate them in your heart. 2. If your duty as a Christian and your loyal devotion to God's cause are paramount, you will hold children, possessions, life itself, of less value. It would be foolish to withhold your affections from your children; they should have abundant love from you, but you are not to set them up as idols, nor to let that love blind you to your duties as a Christian. 3. It is impossible for mere human nature to comprehend the whole character of the Creator, but if we may judge from what we can grasp and understand, it is not believable that a God of infinite love and kindness would do so. 4. If you mean the second coming of Christ, it is not an event to be dreaded, but rather to be prayed for by Christians everywhere. 5. No. 6. Because the condition of the world resembles that which Christ described in his prophetic discourses as being a premonitory sign of his coming. See Matt. 24:1-14.

Subscriber, O. C. Can. Does the statement I notice in a recent sermon, that "Man's pathway is marked out from the cradle to the grave," imply that woman's duty is obligatory?

No, the statement had no such fatalistic meaning, though many wrongdoers have tried to escape their responsibility by that doctrine. Every man knows when he is about to commit deliberate sin, that he is under no compulsion to commit it. The doctrine of the Divine sovereignty cannot be satisfactorily explained, because man cannot fully comprehend the Divine nature; but the practical human side capable of test. Man is responsible for his acts and words, and that fact implies a freedom of choice. Sin comes most frequently yielding to physical desires, as when the drunkard goes to his cups, but he knows even when he yields that he has power to resist if he had the will to use it. God doubtless foresees both the good and the evil in a man's life, but he leaves him free to choose between them. He sometimes interposes by his providence to check the evil. The book of Jonah was probably written by some one who had that problem in mind.

E. S., Montrose, Colo. 1. What became of the 10 of the Covenant? 2. Who was the Prophet Esaias?

1. It is not known what became of it, and conjecture is useless. The Jews still account it as among the hidden things which Messiah will reveal. 2. Esaias or Isaiah was the son of Amoz, but of what race or tribe not known, (see Isa. 1:1.) His father should not be confounded with Amos, the prophet. Esaias was claimed by the Jewish rabbis that Isaac was a brother of King Amaziah. He dwelt in Jerusalem, and prophesied during King Uzziah's reign, and also under Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah. A tradition asserts that he lived into Manasseh's reign, and was by him martyred by being sawn asunder. Your other question has long been, and still is, a fruitful cause of theological discussion.

Pedobaptist Truth-seeker. 1. Does baptism take the place of circumcision in the Christian economy? 2. Is there any New Testament authority for infant baptism?

1. It is regarded by the churches which practice it as an initiatory rite and so far occupies the place of circumcision. It is, however, no act of consecration, the parent desiring to show that as far as he is able he will train the child in Christian light and influence. On extreme ritualists believe that the child derives any benefit from the ceremony. 2. There is no direct New Testament authority for the practice, otherwise the whole question would be authoritatively settled. Such authority as is claimed for it, proceeds from the practice of the Apostles in baptizing "the households" of the converts. (See Acts 16:15, 33.)

L. P. 1. What is the Millennium, and does any one know when it will come? 2. What did Christ intend to teach by his remark about putting the wine into new bottles? Luke 5:36-39?

1. The Millennium is the thousand years spoken of in Isaiah 11, Rev. 20:4, and many other passages, when Christ will reign personally on the earth. It is to be an era of peace and submission and loyal obedience to him. Beyond the fact that it will commence at the second advent of Christ, no one can tell when it will come. People can form their own opinion as to whether the signs of his coming which Christ mentioned (Luke 21:28 at other passages) are in existence. 2. The bottles referred to were made of skins which were liable to burst when the new wine fermented. The simile was used to show that Christianity could not be grafted on Judaism. The new life and doctrine could not be controlled by the old bondage to the law and the letter. The man who accepted Christ's doctrine would cease to pay attention to the puerile rules and regulations as to the Sabbath and the Jewish ceremonies. In short, that the Jewish dispensation was superseded.

F. I. S., Lombardville, Ill. 1. Why are some words in the Bible not apparently emphatic printed italics? 2. Why is the Revised Version not generally used? 3. Why were the cities of Refuge set apart when the commandment forbade killing?

1. The italics are to show that the words are not in the original, but are inserted to make sense in the English idiom. The device enables the translators to give a free translation while at the same time showing what was the literal translation. 2. Because people are attached to the old phrases, which are in many cases more beautiful and poetic than the new. They have a natural affection for the familiar form of expression. The Authorized Version was long time in winning its way into favor. When it first appeared, people regarded it in the same way as they now regard the Revised. It was its way by its superiority, as the Revised Version will. 3. Yes, killing was forbidden but the man who killed another forfeited his own life, that is, put himself outside the protection of the commandment. The cities of Refuge were established to insure him a fair trial, so that unbiased judges could discriminate between murder and manslaughter. They were simply a provision against what we now know as lynching.

Atrocities in the South Seas.

PRESS dispatch from San Francisco contains sad news which was brought to that port by the steamer Mono-wai, from the South Seas. No details appear to have been accessible when the steamer sailed, but the past history of the South Islands furnishes only too abundant grounds for surmising the nature of the catastrophe. It would appear from the report that a trading schooner sailing through Manning Strait which separates this island of Ysabel from Choiseul sent a boat's crew ashore at Rubiana for some purpose, probably for trading with the natives. The crew was allowed to land, but was no sooner on shore than it was set upon by the natives and butchered. One Englishman, one American and eight South Sea Islanders were the victims. The report goes on to say that not only had the trading station on the island been wrecked but missionary station had been attacked but providentially the missionaries had succeeded in effecting their escape and had reached Sydney. Two English missionaries, apparently stationed at Tounan Island were, however, missing and it was feared that they had perished. The islanders had made a great feast of the boat's crew. This news is extremely disheartening as it shows a relapse on the part of the natives into the old savagery, from which it was hoped, they were being gradually reclaimed. Precisely what had occurred, cannot be known until further details are received, but it would appear that the people of the Solomon Islands had made an indiscriminate onslaught on all foreigners, traders, and missionaries alike, and had massacred all on whom they could lay their hands. The missionaries on the island at the last reports belonged to the Menesian Mission, which originated in the work of Bishop Selwyn and was afterwards conducted by Bishop Patteson, who was himself murdered at Nakapu, in the Swallow group of these islands in 1871. The plan adopted in view of the treacherous and savage nature of the people was to pacify them as far as it was possible and to obtain from each island one or more native boys who were taken to an institution on Norfolk Island, and there educated and taught the principles of Christianity. It is hoped that when they returned to the native islands their good reports of the missionaries would prepare the way for establishing a mission station. The boy from the Solomon Islands was named Pipibana, who when he came under Bishop Patteson's care in 1866 was twelve years old. He went home every year or two until 1877, when he settled down at Ota and began to teach his countrymen and try to improve their morals. At the end of three years he had thirty converts who were baptized. He labored until 1885, when his health broke down and he died. Other youths, similarly educated, carried on his work, under the surveillance of the missionaries who visited the islands at regular intervals. The reports taken, show that the missionaries were aware of the danger, but they would not discontinue their work. They followed the example of the great Apostle Paul when similarly menaced could say:

Of these things move me, neither count I dear unto myself, so that I might... testify the Gospel. Acts 20: 24.

Voluntary Squalor.

A distressing story of privation and penury was brought before the selectmen of a

Connecticut district a few days ago. It was reported to them that in an old house on the borders of the village, a man and his wife were starving to death. Both were very old and so weak from lack of proper nourishment, as to be almost helpless. An investigation was made at once. The couple were found as represented, living in dirt and squalor. The husband was seventy-two years of age and the wife seventy-eight. Both were emaciated and appeared to be hungry. There was no food nor fuel in the house and everything about the place bore the impress of extreme poverty. An examination, however, revealed the fact that the wife possessed a valuable collection of curiosities, including precious old china and rare pottery. The collection would easily sell for five thousand dollars. Her husband, also, had property. It was found that at a low calculation he was worth fifteen thousand dollars. The old couple had no one dependent upon them and were living in dirt and squalor of their own free will and not from necessity. They did not wish to spend any of their savings houses and public buildings, the pride of the section were left heaps of ruins. It reached Sherman half an hour later and there it continued its destructive and fatal work. A steel suspension bridge was torn to pieces and its huge girders were twisted like twigs. Not a tree or a house in the path of the storm remained standing after it had passed. Within forty-eight hours one hundred and five bodies of men, women, and children had been brought into the temporary place of reception and the number of persons reported missing, who it is feared are dead in the river, will be believed number a hundred more. The money loss is said to be fully a million dollars. As we read of this terrible destruction before which men are so utterly powerless we realize how terrible is the meaning of the warning uttered by the prophet:

Behold the whirlwind of the Lord goeth forth with fury, a continuing whirlwind: it shall fall upon the head of the wicked. (Jer. 30: 23.)

A Somnambulist's Leap.

A sad fatality is reported from Paterson, N. J. The sixteen-year-old son of one of the citizens has been a somnambulist from early childhood. His parents have tried various methods to cure him, but without success. At irregular intervals, and without any symptoms to put them on their guard, they would hear the boy rise from his bed and go wandering about the house in his sleep. They have been apprehensive of his coming to harm during these nocturnal walks, but until a few days ago he never suffered any serious injury. On liancy, but we keep to the idea of spots of light. Now we are to have a pervading illumination which follows the natural method and fills our rooms with a gentle diffused light. At the exhibition, the sides of the room were covered with glass cylinders, seven feet long and as thick as a man's arm. They were plain plate glass tubes, in which a little air had been left, and there was a wire attached at the ends. When the current was turned on, the tubes became luminous, not with the concentrated light of the incandescent burner, but with a soft brilliance which spread itself like sunshine through the room. Scientific men who saw the light predict that when it is brought to perfection our rooms will be lighted by it at night as pleasantly and effectually as the sun now lights them by day. The journal describing the light, says that no one ever dreamed of such an achievement being possible until now. But what science is slowly and laboriously striving after, the Christian has long expected to witness in infinitely greater glory when he becomes an inhabitant of the heavenly city, which, as John saw it,

Had no need of the sun, neither of the moon to shine in it for the glory of God did lighten it. (Rev. 21: 23.)

BRIEF NOTES.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD would be glad to have from every church in which it has a subscriber, one copy of its latest annual statement, showing its numerical strength and financial condition.

In a Part of Last Week's Edition of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the legend under the portrait of Mgr. Vebadian, was incorrectly printed "Patriarch of Constantinople." The distinguished Armenian prelate is Patriarch of Jerusalem.

In Spite of the Fact that so large a proportion of the English nation possess Bibles, there was a larger number of the sacred volume in whole or in part taken by the public last year than any other book. The British and Foreign Bible Society alone disposed of two and a half million volumes.

The American Tract Society at its recent annual meeting decided to abandon the system hitherto adopted of dividing its work into two departments and determined to unite both under one general management. The report showed that the rentals of the new building appeared likely to leave a balance after meeting all expenses, for the general work of the Society.

The American Baptist Home Missionary Society has closed its year with a debt of $86,245, which is a reduction of $22,553 on the amount at the close of last year.

The Total Amount Collected Last Year in France for the support of the McAll Missions in France was $37,600. At the annual meeting of the American auxiliaries recently held at Elizabeth, N. J., it was decided that part of the appropriation should be applied to Sunday School work carried on in the McAll Missions in France.

Evangelist E. P. Telford has been conducting revival meetings at South Shields, England. They were held in the Methodist Church, which was crowded nightly. On several occasions overflow audiences were addressed in the lecture-hall. Over 340 persons professed conversion, among them several drinking men.

A Commission on the Liquor Traffic Appointed by the Canadian Government, sent queries to ministers of all denominations. To the question, "From your experience and observation as a clergyman, do you consider the use of intoxicating liquors in any shape, harmful morally or socially?" 1,122 replied in the affirmative, and 272 in the negative.

Special Railroad Facilities have been arranged for persons desiring to visit Chautauqua or Niagara Falls during the sessions of the National Educational Association in Buffalo, N. Y., July 3-10. Tickets to Buffalo can be obtained at one fare plus two dollars for the round trip. For the convenience of visitors to Chautauqua tickets can be extended on application to July 31.

A Correspondent in Iowa Writes that the Women's Christian Temperance Union in that State is making remarkable progress. The Unions known as non-partisan have returned almost entirely to the old organization, and have received a hearty welcome. Mrs. Marion H. Dunham, the president of the Iowa Union, has displayed much tact in bringing about this desirable result.

Dr. B. C. Atterbury, the Eminent Presbyterian medical missionary of Peking, has been the recipient of a high distinction from the Emperor of China. The Emperor has conferred upon him the Order of the Double Dragon in recognition of the services he rendered in connection with the Red Cross Society during the war between China and Japan. This is an honor rarely given to foreigners, and then only to monarchs or their chief generals or statesmen.

The International Committee of Young Women's Christian Associations announce for summer conferences. Following are places and dates: Asheville, N. C., June 12-22; Lake Geneva, Wis., June 24-30; Northfield, Mass., July 1-12; Mt. St. College, Alameda county, near San Francisco, June 5-15. The order of the day will be, mornings, spent in conference and study; afternoons to be given up to rest and recreation, and evenings devoted to public meetings.

and had gone from one point of economy to another, until their apparent destitution had aroused the pity of their neighbors. They were entitled to their pity, but not in the form it took. People who have allowed their love of money to grow to such proportions as these, manifest a mental obliquity that is almost dementia. Yet between them and others who labor for riches, while they starve their souls, the difference is only one of degree. To both the words of the preacher apply:

There is one alone and he hath neither child nor brother; yet is there no end of all his labor; neither saith he for whom do I labor and bereave my soul of good? This is vanity, yea it is a sore travail. Eccles. 4: 8.

The Destructive Tornadoes.

Ruin, devastation, and death were wrought by the dreadful tornado that swept over two counties of Northern Texas on May 15. The storm began near Justin in the south east of Denton County and passing north and east through Grayson County, it struck Red River in the Indian Territory where it broke up into several smaller storms which did great injury in Kansas, Kentucky and Illinois. The ferocity of the storm spent itself chiefly on Sherman, the county seat of Grayson, sixty-five miles north of Dallas, a town which at the last census had a population of 7335. It is estimated that the storm traveled one hundred miles and cut a swath about one hundred and fifty yards wide, uprooting and overturning everything in its course. The cloud was seen at Justin about four in the afternoon. It was revolving rapidly and trailing near the ground in the appalling way that the people of the west recognize with horror. Trees in its path were stripped of their foliage and torn up by the roots, and fine the morning of May 11, the boy's father was awakened by hearing him walking along the corridor outside his room. He rose and hastily throwing on his clothes, followed him. He hurried his steps as he saw the boy ascending the ladder that led to the roof. But he was not quick enough. Before he could overtake him, the boy had reached the roof, and poising himself a moment on the parapet, with his hands clasped above his head, in the attitude of one about to dive into the water, he plunged downward, and striking the pavement, crushed his skull. Probably the intense heat of the weather had suggested to the poor sleeping boy a dream of cool ocean depths, which his habit of sleep-walking turned to his death. It was a sad mistake that the dreamer made, but infinitely sadder is the mistake of those who, harassed by worldly trouble, or remorse, dream that in death they will find peace or oblivion, and deliberately take their own lives. Far nobler and wiser was the resolve of the afflicted patriarch, who said:

All the days of my appointed time will I wait till my release come. (Job 14: 14, R. V.)

Artificial Sunshine.

A scientific journal publishes an enthusiastic description of a new light originally produced by Mr. Tesla and improved by Mr. McFarlane Moore. At a recent meeting of the American Institute of Electrical Engineers, an exhibition of this light was given which astonished every spectator, and convinced all that a revolution in the system of lighting homes and public buildings was near at hand. Hitherto, says the report, we have been following the principle of our remote ancestors, who had no idea of illumination but that of the torch. We have improved on the torch in bril-

THE BOOK SHELF

Soon I Shall Go.*

SOON I shall go
From earthly grief and earthly fears
To where life's crystal waters flow
Beyond this vale of tears.

Soon I shall stand
Before the throne of God on high,
And sing with angels in that land
Where none shall ever die.

Soon I shall hear
The voices of the saints above,
Rejoicing, where is cast out fear
By heaven's perfect love.

Soon I shall sing
Surrounded by the saints in light,
The praises of my Lord and King,
Beyond the shades of night.

Soon I shall see—
Oh, blessed thought! Oh, truth sublime!—

The face of him who died for me,

A White House Hostess.*

WITH the departure of Jefferson the burden of office fell for the first time wholly upon Madison's shoulders, and it is little wonder that he was oppressed by the difficulty of worthily filling the position hallowed and dignified by the memories of Washington, Adams, and Jefferson. It was no less serious a matter for Dolly Madison to feel devolving upon herself the responsibility of living up to the standards set by Martha Washington and Abigail Adams.

One of Mrs. Madison's predecessors was fully impressed by the solemnity of the situation. With somewhat irritating self-complacency, Mrs. Adams writes to her daughter in June of this year: "With respect to Mrs. Madison's influence it ought to be such as Solomon describes his virtuous woman's to be—one who should do him good and not evil all the days of her life. So that the heart of her husband may safely trust in her. I believe I may say with safety that her predecessors left her no evil example."

It must be admitted that under Mrs. Madison's influence, life at the White House lost something of its simplicity. Dress grew gayer, entertainments more elaborate, and when the President's wife took the air, it was in a chariot drawn by four horses—a chariot built by Fielding of Philadelphia at a cost of fifteen hundred dollars. The holding of levees and weekly dinner-parties at the White House, with all the inevitable household cares, proved a serious strain on Mrs. Madison's health and strength, but after all, as Monroe once observed when asked if he were not completely worn out by the weary hours of standing and hand-shaking at his receptions, "a little flattery will support one through a great deal of fatigue."

Mrs. Madison was surrounded in these early days of her husband's administration by a group of men and women whose fame has survived for well-nigh a century, and the universal and sincere regard with which they regarded her would in itself constitute a strong claim for her own distinction. Nearest to her naturally stood Madison's official family, George Clinton of New York, Eustis of Massachusetts, Gallatin the Swiss, with his American wife, Paul Hamilton, and Colonel Monroe, the Secretary of State.

silk hose, knee-buckles and pumps. His brow was somewhat retreating and unimpressive, but his eye so clear and straightforward that it justified Jefferson's remark that Monroe was so honest that if you turned his soul inside out there would not be a spot on it. Inseparable from the Secretary of State was his wife, formerly a Miss Kortwright, famous as a New York beauty in the latter days of the Revolution, and known afterwards in Paris as "la belle Americaine." The South furnished its full share of conspicuous figures to Washington society. John Marshall towered above all. John Randolph was there with his high-pitched voice, his clean-shaven, "young-old" face and sarcastic mouth. Henry Clay, from Mrs. Madison's own Hanover County, once "The Mill-boy of the Slashes," now high in the councils of state, retained all his old-time simplicity. His face was peculiar and striking, with sharp eyes twinkling under overhanging eyebrows, with long, straight hair and deep lines drawn about the lips and nostrils. Calhoun, too, came in 1811 to take part in Congressional affairs, and was one of the most noticeable figures, his great head loaded down with a weight of shaggy, ragged locks. His wife was among the intimate friends of Mrs. Madison's circle, as was also the brilliant Mrs. Van Ness, whose entertainments were among the leading social events of Washington in those days.

In Mrs. Madison's occupations, charitable, domestic, and social, she was ably assisted by her two sisters, Lucy and Anna, both of whom were at this time living in Washington—Mrs. Cutts settled there by her husband's public duties, and Mrs. Washington (Lucy Payne) having made her home with Mrs. Madison after the death of her husband.

SOME time in the reign of Hezekiah, when the kingdom of Judah was still inviolate, but shivering to the shock of the fall of Samaria, and probably while Sargon the destroyer was pushing his way past Judah to meet Egypt at Raphia, a Judean prophet of the name of Micah, standing in sight of the Assyrian march, attacked the sins of his people and prophesied their speedy overthrow beneath the same flood of war. If we be correct in our surmise, the exact year was 720-719 B.C. Amos had been silent thirty years; Hosea hardly fifteen; Isaiah was in the midway of his career.

Micah is no longer a book, or an oration, but flesh and blood upon a home and a countryside of his own. We see him on the housetop pouring forth his words before the hills and the far-stretching heathen land. In the name of every village within sight he reads a symbol of the curse that is coming upon his country, and of the sins that have earned the curse. So some of the greatest poets have caught their music from the nameless brooklets of their boyhood's fields; and many a prophet has learned to read the tragedy of man and God's verdict upon sin in his experience of village life.

Whatever be the origin of the separate oracles which compose this passage (Micah 4: 1-7), they form as they now stand a beautiful whole, rising from Peace through Freedom to Love. They begin with obedience to God and they culminate in the most glorious service which God or man may undertake, the service of saving the lost. See how the Divine spiral ascends. We have, first, Religion the centre and origin of all, compelling the attention of men by its historical evidence of justice and righteousness. We have the world's willingness to learn of it. We have the results in the widening brotherhood of nations, in universal Peace, in Labor freed from War, and with none of her resources absorbed by the conscriptions and armaments which in our times are deemed necessary for enforcing peace. We have the universal diffusion and security of property, the prosperity and safety of the humblest home. And, finally, we have this free strength and wealth inspired by the example of God Himself to nourish the broken and gather in the forwarder.

Such is the ideal world, seen and promised two thousand five hundred years ago, out of as real an experience of human sin and failure as ever mankind woke to. Are we nearer the Vision to-day, or does it still hang upon time's horizon, that line which seems so stable from every seer's point of view, but which moves from the generations as fast as they travel to it?

So far from this being so, there is much in the Vision that is not only nearer us than it was to the Hebrew prophets, and not only abreast of us, but actually achieved and behind us, as we live and thrive still onward. Yes, brothers, actually behind us! History has in part fulfilled the promised influence of religion upon the nations. The Unity of God has been owned, and the civilized peoples bow to the standards of justice and of mercy first revealed from Mount Zion. Many nations and powerful nations acknowledge the arbitrament of the God of the Bible. We have had revealed that High Fatherhood of which every family in heaven and earth is named; and wherever that is believed the brotherhood of men is confessed. We have seen Sin, that profound discord in man and estrangement from God, of which all human hatreds and malices are the fruit, atoned and reconciled by a Sacrifice in face of which human pride and passion stand abashed.

The first part of the Vision is fulfilled. The nations stream to the God of Jerusalem and his Christ. And though to-day our Peace be but a paradox, and the "Christian" nations stand still from war not in love, but in fear of one another, there are in every nation an increasing number of men and women, with growing influence, who, without being fanatics for peace, or blind to the fact that war may be a people's duty in fulfilment of its own destiny or in relief of the enslaved, do yet keep themselves from foolish forms of patriotism, and by their recognition of each other across all national differences make sudden and unconsidered war more and more of an impossibility. God help us to use this peace for the last ideals of his prophet!

May we see, not that of which our modern peace has been far too full, mere freedom for the wealth of the few to increase at the expense of the mass of mankind. May our peace mean the gradual disarmament of the nations, the increase of labor, the diffusion of property, and, above all, the redemption of the waste of the people and the recovery of our outcasts. Without this, peace is no peace; and better were war to burn out by its fierce fires those evil humors of our secure comfort, which render us insensible to the needy and fallen at our side. Without the redemptive forces at work which Christ brought to earth, peace is no peace; and the cruelties of war, that slay and mutilate so many, are as nothing to the cruelties of peace which leave us insensible to the outcasts and the perishing, of whom there are so many even in our civilization.

Life's Battles.*

LIFE is a round of battles, bravely fought,
Or weakly lost for want of noble will
To meet each foe before the standard brought With weapons tempered with unerring skill.

Wrong, gilded o'er, is still more deeply wrong
In that deceit is welded with its taint;
So strength to meet it must be bravely strong
In eyes that quail not, hearts too bold to taint!

Far better to have fallen, pierced with blades
Which valiant, ardent blood has deeply dyed,
Than thus to creep beneath desponding shades

In hope that bloodless battle thus to hide.
Far better to meet life with noble scars
Than with weak hands to let the standard fall:
And fiends of evil triumph, as if wars,
That gave them victory, gave to you the pall!

Measuring Time.*

THE earliest device for measuring time was doubtless the sun-dial. It is simply a round plate or disc of metal, with a small piece of metal standing upright in such a position that when the sun shines, the shadow will be thrown upon the round cylinder or disc, around which are figures like those on the face of a watch or clock. Such methods of measuring time we know were used at least seven hundred and thirteen years before Christ, for in the book of Isaiah, chapter and 8th verse, we find a very direct allusion to it. King Alfred of England used to use candles that were of uniform length; each candle would burn three hours, and by burning four candles one after another, he could measure the hours of the day. In order to prevent the air from blowing against the candle, and thus making it burn more rapidly or interfering with its accuracy in measuring time, he placed a horn or shield around it, as in the old cathedrals this was the way they measured time. Later on they used hour glasses, such as you sometimes placed on the piano when girls are practicing their music lesson. Sometimes I see small ones in the kitchen, which are used for timing the eggs while they are boiling, and it is to these forms of glances that various poetical allusions are made when death is spoken of as the "sand of life" running out.

Later came the clocks. They were made about two thousand years ago, and were very rude and awkward. The watches were made about four hundred and fifty years ago, but they were very large, and you would almost need a bag to carry your watch for you, it was so heavy. Smaller watches were first made about two hundred years ago, and now they have some that are so very small that you could carry six or seven in your vest pocket without inconvenience.

I was wondering the other day why a clock should have the long hand to point to the minutes, and the short hand to the hours; but after all, it seems very natural that the greater emphasis, that the greater importance should be attached to the longer hand. It points to the minutes, though it were constantly saying to you and to me, look out for these minute look out for these small parts of the hour and the whole hour will take care of its. The big hand points to the minutes, cause after all, they are the important things. It is like the old saying, "if take care of the pennies, the dollars will take care of themselves." If we will take care of the minutes, the hours will take care of themselves.

Did you ever stop to think that a man who is thirty-five years old has had 1 solid years of Sundays. And the man who is seventy years old has had ten solid years of Sundays? With ten years given to worship and the study of God's Word a man of seventy ought to know a great deal concerning the teachings of the Bible. May God teach us to number our days that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom.

In an Old Spanish Town.

Valladolid and its Quiet Homes—A Seventeenth Century Palace.

AMONG the older Spanish cities there are few that possess more quaintly picturesque attractions than Valladolid. Our illustration on this page shows the market-place of this ancient town—a scene that is fairly representative scores of other cities in Southern Europe from the Adriatic to the Atlantic. Valladolid is in a small valley on the left bank of the little river Pisuerga, but the whole region is elevated ground, fully two thousand feet above sea-level. Madrid, the capital, is nearly thirty miles away to the south-west, and such is the extreme provincialism of the Spanish rural districts, even at this day, that very few of the people who live at such a distance ever think of visiting the metropolis.

All the buildings of Valladolid are of a substantial sort; indeed, the whole town impresses one with the conviction that it has been built to defy the ravages of time. There are few streets and squares, the finest being the Plaza Mayor, and there is a grand cathedral whose foundation was laid in 1585, but which for some reason was never fully completed, only the nave and tower being finished. As in all Spanish cities, there is a plethora of churches, one dating from 1170, another 1286, and still others having been erected in the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries. Some of the finest examples of the celebrated painter Rubens and also of Berruguete are found in an fifteenth century classical building. There is, too, a royal palace, but it is now practically neglected, and rarely used for the housing of the kings and queens of Castile, as it was in the seventeenth century, (when it was erected) and for over a hundred years later. It is put to more utilitarian purpose and so also several old-time convents which are now used as barracks. Formerly the Cortes met in the old city and in the fifteenth century King John II. made his residence there, but when the capital was moved to Madrid in 1560, Valladolid began to decay.

Its people are now engaged in the manufacture of silk, linen, pottery, jewelry and other articles, and as the section is a fairly agricultural country, there is considerable revenue from farming also. Probably the most notable historical event in connection with the place—setting aside all royal associations—is that Columbus died there in 1506. It is now very little more than a provincial town, with less than 60,000 inhabitants, who lead eminent-quiet and industrious lives.

Crowing Like Each Other.

It is learned that some curious investigations have recently been undertaken by a photographic society in Geneva.

The purpose was to show that the longer a married couple lived together—we apprehend harmoniously—the more and more became the resemblance which the two persons bore to each other. Photographs of seventy-eight couples were taken, as well as an equal number of adult brothers and sisters. On careful inspection it was found that the married couples were more like each other than the brothers and sisters of the same blood. Apparently, therefore, there seems to be a stronger force available for the production of "family likenesses" even than that of hereditary transmission. In accepting the statement them. To avoid this cruel deed, the officers made paper dolls and cut them in pieces and threw them into the sea, after the Empress had rubbed them with her hands. She soon began to recover, and finally grew very strong. So the parents through the desire of health for their daughters, made paper dolls in imitation of this incident and offered them some food. These dolls were thrown away every year. As years passed on people became dissatisfied with paper dolls, so they kept on improving and adding to the number. At first there were only two dolls, one representing the Empress and the other her son, but gradually her ministers and servants and many others were added. As the dolls were improved, they were not thrown away every year as before. Those who cannot afford to buy the whole set have only the principal dolls, but the rich people have them arranged on shelves with little tables in front of each one of them. Rice fried with sugar is the principal offering.

Old Hungarian Customs.

At the exhibition in Budapest, in honor of the thousandth anniversary of the foundation of the Hungarian Kingdom in Europe, there are many remarkably inter-started to walk to a certain part of London and were caught in a dense fog. "Both of us," said Mr. Hughes, "knew the way, but we lost it half a dozen times. Kingsley's spirit seemed to rise as the fog thickened! "Isn't this like life?" he said, after one of our blunders—"a deep, yellow fog all round, with a dim light here and there shining through. You grope your way on from one lamp to another, and you go up wrong streets and back again. But you get home at last; there's always light enough for that."

CLOTHE THE CHILDREN.

THE woodlands and fields around Mont-Lawn have already put on the dress of early summer. Great dog-wood blossoms and clusters of cherry blooms nod in the soft May winds, and already the apple-trees are in flower. Blood-root, jack-in-the-pulpit, wild violet and dragon's-tooth bespangle the paths on every side, and stray beds of the modest little wild-strawberry flower give hint of enjoyment for the little ones at our Children's Home during the weeks to come. Everywhere, nature is looking her loveliest, as if to welcome back the army of poor, little, pale-cheeked, tenement waifs, whose advance guard will arrive from the big city about the middle of June.

In anticipation of their arrival, the Home is now being thoroughly overhauled and put in readiness, for there will be no time for preparations when our little guests appear. Like a swarm of happy Brownies, glad of a temporary release from the hot and sickly city alleys and slums, they will capture Mont-Lawn, its House-mother and care-takers, its fields and woods and birds and flowers, and will literally overrun it, like a merry army of tiny invaders. To very many of them the charming country place will be a revelation, for, as in former years, doubtless a considerable proportion will be having the first country frolic and outing they ever had in their lives.

Our Children's Home Staff has been improved and strengthened this year. Under House-mother Collins (who has now had two seasons of experience in the work), there will be a corps of Christian young women with missionary training as care-takers, and a competent lady physician. Thus, both as to moral and material needs, our little guests will be well cared for, as it is the aim of the conductors of the Home not only to surround the children with whatever is conducive to a pleasant ten days' outing, but to make an impression on their young minds and hearts that will endure even after they have returned to their city homes.

We are constantly receiving letters that express the kindest interest in our Fresh-Air work, some of the more recent, announcing an intention of holding Lawn Parties, Bazaars, and similar entertainments, the proceeds to be applied in aid of the Home. One very kind offer comes from a lady, representing a number of young women who will shortly hold a "Sewing Circle" for the Home, the garments made to be such as are most useful for poor children. Contributions of suitable clothing—frocks, pinafores, hosiery, hats, boots and shoes, and undergarments for girls of from six to twelve, and boys from six to ten will be gratefully accepted, if sent to the Home by any of our friends. Many of our little charges come to us shoeless and hatless, and with such a tatterdemalion aspect generally, that we are compelled to equip them almost from top to toe, and this item of clothing alone, in the handling of several thousand children in the course of a season, is a very considerable one, as many hundreds of summer garments have to be supplied. All contributions of summer clothing should be addressed, expressage prepaid, to "The Children's Home, Mont-Lawn, Nyack, N. Y." Nothing should be sent that is not in good condition and serviceable for children of the ages stated.

THE MARKET-SQUARE OF VALLADOLID, SPAIN.

of the society in question, it is not difficult, in a certain measure, to account for the phenomenon referred to. Human beings, for example, have quite a faculty for copying each other in their ways, movements, and temperaments.

Imitation, conscious or unconscious, often produces a resemblance in expression which may deceive at first glance, leading the observer to think he sees similarity of form and feature. Any society, however, that would attempt to draw a general conclusion from so small a number as seventy-eight couples, is ignorant of the first principle that should rule in such investigation, namely, that to establish a resemblance and avoid the possibility of accidental coincidence, a great number of cases must be taken.

A Feast of Dolls.

Once a year in Japan is the "Feast of Dolls." How it originated is told by Susie A. Pratt, a missionary, as follows: In ancient times when the Empress Jingo was returning from her expedition in Corea she landed in the southern part of Japan. While there, she was prostrated and grew dangerously sick. Her ministers were much troubled and went to the temple, to inquire what they should do for her. The god told them to cut in pieces some of the men and throw their bodies into the sea, after the Empress had rubbed against esting articles shown. The horses and cattle men from the Pusza are dressed just as their forefathers were many hundred years ago, and armed with the old weapons—the hatchet and the lasso-like leather whip that has a ball of lead at the end, which they, no doubt, imported from Asia a thousand years ago. There are also fishermen from the Theiss and Danube living almost a savage life—huntsmen, forest peasants and wood-cutters from the Carpathian and Transylvanian mountains. For all these the world has not changed in a thousand years. In the three pavilions devoted to hunting, fishing, and the rearing of cattle, the oldest tools that are known will be exhibited, and it will be found that somewhere in Hungary they are still in use, though the Hungarians, no doubt, used them in their original homes on the Caspian Sea, or on the Ural and the Volga before they came to the Danube. The old carts, the yokes for the oxen, the ploughs, the pole-axes, the hoes and spades, and the saddles, all are still in use, and almost unchanged from the specimens preserved as antiquities.

Lost the Home Path.

The late Mr. Hughes of England, better known as the author of "Tom Brown at Rugby," used to relate this incident concerning Rev. Charles Kingsley and himself: One winter's night the two friends

CHAPTER XXII.
Coming and Going.

SAD at heart, missing his friend at every turn, Sandy grew despondent and lost interest in all that was going on. He tried to "brace himself up," as he phrased it, but he felt sick and sorrowful and was no longer the bright, cheerful Sandy of old.

"Why don't you go to see your friend Nurse Morton?" a comrade asked him one night as he sat, his elbows on his knees and his face resting between his hands, sunk in a gloomy reverie. "You want toning up. One of those doctors will give you something to put life in you."

"Guess I will," said Sandy who was glad of any excuse to see Janet and talk with her about Ned. He applied for permission and received it.

Janet was busy when he arrived, and as he waited for her, his old friend in the ambulance service saw him and greeted him cheerfully.

"Waiting to see Nurse Morton," Sandy explained in answer to his question.

"Ah, you come from the same town, I remember, you said. We have a patient here from that town now,—a Captain Newhall. Do you know him?"

"Well, yes; sorter know him. He wasn't what you might call a bosom friend," Sandy admitted.

"I guess he'd like to see you, whether or not," said the man. "He's been asking for someone to take something down. Sort of statement or suthin he's got on his mind. Confession mayhap. He looks like a man as might confess a pretty long time before he got it all off. He ain't the kind of man you'd care to make a guardian for orphan children or to trust in a deal when you didn't see your way. Anyway he says this is important and he wants it written out so he can put his name to it afore he quits. It might do someone a good turn if you went to him. All our folks are too busy."

"I'm not very quick with the pen," said Sandy. "And I don't like the man. You've just about hit it in what you've said about him. But I'll see him. Maybe it'll be good for somebody else if it is no good for him. Where is he?"

"I'll show you. Glad you don't settle old scores at a time like this. Perhaps he'll go off easier for having seen you."

Even Sandy could see, as he looked at Tobias, that there was no hope for him. Death was written very plainly on that evil countenance. He was unconscious just then, but the nurse said he regained his senses at intervals, and he might do it again, though he would not do so many more times. The end was evidently very near. Sandy stood by the side of his cot waiting for the wave of intelligence that might cross the haggard face once more. At last it came. Tobias moved uneasily and opened his eyes.

"Here is one of your old neighbors," said the nurse. "Now is your time if you want to say anything."

Tobias looked at the tall figure standing by the side of the cot and recognized it. He motioned to Sandy to stoop.

"I am sorry," he whispered, as Sandy bowed over him. "I suppose I am pretty near the end. I'd die easier for doing the right thing. I can't write now. Besides there's no time for an affidavit, but you are a lawyer, and they'll believe what you say. I made an affidavit before, and then I recalled it and said it was true—that I was delirious. I am delirious."

"No," said Sandy. "But I will remember what you say. Go on."

"I can't explain now. I am a poor fellow. All you've got to do is to remember I stand by the affidavit. It was true. Janet made me mad. She wouldn't listen to me, and I went back on what I said, to get even with her. But it was true—remember that."

"I will," said Sandy. "I'm glad that's off my mind. I wish you could see to some other things for me. 'There's that child, Ethel, you remember Ethel, at the Skipper's? She must be found. She's Madame Morton's grandchild. I will tell you where she is. You—'"

But Tobias was never to finish that sentence. The brief lucid interval was at an end. His very struggle to retain his senses seemed to exhaust him. He lapsed into a condition of coma and died without regaining consciousness.

Sandy sat down and laboriously wrote down from memory what Tobias had said, with a memorandum of date and circumstances. He also persuaded the nurse to add a line stating that she was present at the interview, though she had not heard all that was said.

He had just finished this precautionary measure, which showed that if Sandy had been placed in different circumstances, he would have done credit to the legal profession, when Janet, who had heard of his being in the hospital came to look for him.

Sandy told her of Tobias Newhall's death, and showed her his memorandum.

"I will send this to Squire Manning," said Janet. "He may find it important. He is taking more interest in the case than I am. I have seen so many deaths and so much suffering, that somehow this question of the property does not seem to stir my interest, as it would once have done. I am sorry the poor man did not live long enough to give us a clue to Ethel's hiding place. She must be found, but it is difficult to get upon her track."

"Had this man Newhall cheated you?" Sandy asked, having heard nothing of the case Janet referred to.

"He may have been mixed up in it," Janet answered, "but his story is that Lawyer Skeele is the guilty party, and the affidavit he mentioned to you was to the effect that the property of Madame Morton that Skeele said was left to his daughter, was really left to me. Lawyer Manning writes me that before the case is through, Skeele is likely to be disbarred and perhaps sent to prison. I hope it is not so bad as that; I could not bear the thought of the old man ending his days in prison on my account. Perhaps he will give up the property peaceably."

"I don't think Skeele is that kind of man," said Sandy. "He is the kind that holds on till the law compels him to let go. You may depend on his fighting."

Everyone who knew the old lawyer had the same opinion, but they did not know how he was being harassed by his conscience night and day—especially night.

Lawyer Manning had pushed forward the case and felt sure that Skeele would be landed where he belonged and where he ought to have been long ago. He waited only for Janet's return to put the spark to the train that would explode beneath Skeele's edifice of fraud.

Had Skeele a presentiment of what was coming? No one knew. He grew more silent and moody, day by day and looked more harassed. He persuaded Lavina to go on a visit to some friends in Washington and he stayed alone in the big house. But in Lavina's absence, he need not sleep in that dreadful room where Madame Morton died and where the Will was drawn, and where now he seemed to be haunted by Madame's presence. He was so gloomy that people avoided him and if any one spoke to him, his scowl almost scared them away.

But one morning Blakey was astonished to find the old man sitting in the room near the Morton mansion. He had heard some news from Lavina and he wanted to ascertain what Blakey knew. Mrs. Blakey had heard from Washington, too, and Blakey was too full of the news to care who knew. The whole village would soon know.

"Yes," Blakey said, "Janet is married to Captain Melrose. The Captain is well and they are coming home. They are to be here to-morrow. Ethel, you remember Ethel, Squire, who used to be at Skipper Dan's? She is coming with them. She turns out to be the little daughter of Madame's prodigal son John, who died in Janet's house. Janet is her guardian."

That was enough. Skeele waited to hear no more. He turned back into his solitary house and was not seen again all day. The next morning, before it was quite light, he left the Morton mansion by the back door, and crept away carrying a carpet-bag which he had hastily packed with valuables during the night. Once clear of the premises, he walked quickly, as if anxious to get away without being seen. Perhaps, in the dim light, he might have succeeded, but for one pair of sharp eyes that saw and recognized him.

Blakey was out at the old well drawing an early bucket for Mrs. Blakey, who was making a vigorous clatter in the kitchen because expecting "a lot of company from Washington that very day." That she might be ready by twelve she had Blakey up in good season and set him to work by five.

"Why, ef there ain't Judson Skeele!" soliloquized Blakey at the well. "How one-sided he walks! He looks as if like the vane on the church-steeple he had got a knock on one side and can't seem to be back again! What is he up to at this hour?"

Blakey was so surprised that he let his bucket of water tumble into the well again. Mrs. Blakey spied this mishap and called it "a sheer waste of water."

"Well, mother"—which she never was in the world—"if you had seen Judson Skeele this time of day a-hurryin' down the road, you might have dropped not the bucket, but tumbled in yourself," asserted Blakey.

"Massy, he round at this hour! They say he's a dreadful hand to lie a-bed. What mischief he up to?"

"See for yourself, mother! He's got a whole carpet-bag to pack it in!"

Mrs. Blakey's sharp eyes glistened at the window, and she saw for herself the lawyer as he hurried away, his head down and averted, a bag in his hand.

"What is he a-goin' that way for, and this time of day?" she wondered. "He is takin' the street that goes to the beach."

Two other women of the village with sharp eyes saw him hurrying off. At the fish-houses, Sandy noticed him on the beach. Opposite Castaway Ledge, he was seen by another fisherman. A boy asserted that he knew, yes, he could swear that he saw "Old Skeele," crossing the bare sands between the beach and the ledge, that he watched "Old Skeele" pacing the rocks and actually—yes, he could swear to it—actually saw "Old Skeele" sitting down on Mary's Rock. That was the last ever seen of Judson Skeele by any boy of that village.

What became of him then? Nobody ever saw him come back to the beach. What then? Was his body found after that, rolled ashore by some breaker unwilling that so much rascality should find a grave in the sea? No body was found on the gray sands under the far-reaching, lonely sky. What became of Judson Skeele if he never returned from the ledge? It was an endless subject of discussion among the fishermen. Did Skeele come back from "Mary's Rock" or not? If he stayed, did he wait for the wave that would roll itself over him and hide him from justice, or did he not wait, throwing himself and all his burden of guilt down into the deep waters just outside of Castaway Ledge? The fishermen often discussed these points over the barre they were packing with mackerel, among their pots of lobsters which they were boiling, or when digging clams in the oozy flats. One votary of the marvelous declared that on a certain afternoon when the storm was chasing his boat home as he was off the ledge, he saw "a-suthin on Mary's Rock, and it looked like O Skeele with his bag in his hand. As the person thus mentioned, never came ashore to deny or confirm any of these reports everybody along shore felt at liberty not only to discuss but believe them. As the months went by, it was true that somebody from the villagers and absent abroad thought they saw him in Europe. Lavir Skeele, who had mysteriously disappeared, was said to be with him, she holding her nose and he hanging down his head. Then somebody saw or thought they saw the runaway in Egypt, away up on the Nile, while a third party wondered if they were not "that rascal Skeele" they met one day far up an Alpine mountain. So far off and near places that were inaccessible, this uneasy mortal was seen, as it easy, as vagrant as the Wandering Jew himself. That, though, did not satisfy the gossip of the seashore.

"I know, well as I want to know any thing," said Skipper Dan, "that old Skeele never left 'Mary's Rock' till a wave-wave I mean—came and took him when he belonged."

Skipper Dan then would rap the floor with his wooden leg, and in his mind at least, that settled it. And yet it was never settled.

Did Janet Melrose and her husband make their home in the big Morton mansion? Of course, her claim to it was not undisputed, and it was conceded to her. To Ethel came the share of property Madame Morton had bequeathed, minus seven thousand dollars Lawyer Skeele had "borrowed" for that mysterious journey which ended in Mary's Rock, or some other place. Janet and her husband were made trustees of the balance of this property, and honestly, wisely cared for it.

Somebody asks again, did Janet move into the Morton mansion?

"No," said Janet—and like an obedient husband, Captain Melrose assented—"let us stay here. We will let the other house. Our roof is not so high as that roof, and our chimneys less numerous, but this more homelike."

One person would have been glad to have them stay here. That was Ned, whose memorial stone in the corner of the village cemetery could be seen from the western windows of Janet's home, especially those of her room. Ned standing one day in that corner had noticed that the birds sang very sweetly there and that Janet's house could be seen from the spot.

"Sandy, when they put me away," he whispered the day he was dying, "you see that it is in the south-west corner of the graveyard. The birds sing there."

The rest of his reason he hid in his heart like a perfume-box too precious to be opened without special reason.

Captain Melrose erected at his expense a beautiful stone. This was its inscription

Questions on the Christian Endeavor
Topic for the Week Beginning June 7.
Yrk. 9: 33-37; John 13: 1-17.

HOW strange to these disciples, who had been disputing about which of them should be the greatest, must have been Christ's definition of greatness! It was a reversal of all the current theories. The new kingdom was not to be like the kingdoms of the world in this respect. And it was the new kingdom that scorned these men. Their position in their own land among their own people was obscure; and to the Romans they were contemptible. But in the new kingdom, that which they expected that would establish, they expected a high place. They had been faithful to their Master in his poverty and humiliation; might they not look for distinction when he took his rightful place as King of the Jews? But when the places were assigned, who would have been a chief of the twelve? The dispute is settled by a paradox. The one who serves must be the greatest. This is to be the law and practice of the new kingdom. The ruler is not capricious or pragmatic. It was sound philosophy and strictly consistent with the other principles of the dominion. He who would save his life should lose it, and he who was ready to lose his life should save it. So, the way to distinction in the new order is not to be in striving after it, but the path of humble service. We see how this principle working in the world, the people are slowly and patiently coming to Christ's redemptive time was, when the monarch was the hereditary, divinely appointed ruler of the realm. But now, men chafe under such a conception of the position of a ruler. In constitutional lands the greatest man is the public servant who unwisely and faithfully executes the national will. In our island, in England, and in France, the public confides now to men of its way of thinking, and withdraws it so much they cease to be of its way of thinking. It amazed a President of France who had been bred in the traditions of despotic rule, when he was told that there were but two courses open to him—"to submit or resign." It was not for him to direct the policy of the nation. He was there to carry out the national programme. It seemed to be so everywhere. The most powerful statesman is he who obeys, he whom the people regard as their devoted servant. If he perceives, as occasionally he will, that the nation is wrong, that it is rash and could be precipitate, that it is mistaken in thinking that a certain course would be for its welfare, then he may and ought to oppose it. But even then, he must get his own course adopted, only by performing another act of service, enlightening the people and convincing them of their error. In whatever walk of life a man is, if he cherishes ambition, though he may be only a clerk in a store, or a workman in a factory, there is only one way of attaining distinction, and that is by useful service. The way to rule is to obey. Honor comes to him who benefits others, who strives to promote the happiness and welfare of others, not to him who seeks his own welfare and prosperity. The practically has the world adopted this principle of Christ's kingdom, recognizing its soundness, as in the end it will accept all its principles. Whosoever would be greatest, must be the servant of all.

A Prayer.

(Written for "The Christian Herald.")

WHEN the world is dark and drear,
And my bosom beats with fear,
When no worldly shelter's found
And the earth is sinking ground,
When the waves are on the sea,
Saviour, keep me close to thee!

When the darkness is so deep
That I dare not even creep,
When temptation's arrows fly
And obscure the very sky,
When beneath me all is sand,
Precious Saviour, take my hand.

When my friends forsake me here
And ten thousand foes are near,
When I lose my earthly stay
And my very hopes decay,

When the surging billows roll,
Saviour, then support my soul.

Newman Grove, Neb.

Be True.

THOU must be true thyself,
If thou the truth wouldst teach;
Thy soul must overflow, if thou
Another's soul wouldst reach:
It needs the overflow of heart
To give the lips full speech.

Think truly, and thy thoughts
Shall the world's famine feed:
Speak truly, and each word of thine
Shall be a fruitful seed;
Live truly, and thy life shall be
A great and noble creed.

A Chapter of Six Visions.

A Remarkable Series of Six Apocalyptic Scenes Described by the Seer of Patmos.

BY REV. W. FRITH.

THE fifth of these six visions described in this fourteenth chapter of Revelation is in some respects the most significant of them all. The vision presents a two-fold aspect to John. For, first, he has a golden crown on his head; and, in his hand he holds a sharp sickle. The former imports his authority, dominion, and dignity; the latter his special mission and purpose at this time—viz., to gather the full harvest.

Ver. 15 records the mission of another angel, as if authorizing the ingathering of the harvest. On this we may observe that if the golden crowned angel with his sharp sickle (who is called the Son of Man) be indeed the ascended Lord of the harvest, the mission of this angel can only be understood by supposing the covenant occurrence of the Three divine Persons in the Eternal Trinity; and this angel expressing the will of the Father and the Holy Ghost to the Son through the angel in a phenomenal manner, so as to make it intelligible to our human perception.

On the harvest itself and the celestial reaper, we note the following things:

1. It is the harvest, and so, "the End of the Age," as taught in that most instructive parable of our Lord in Matt. 13: 39, a full and prayerful consideration of which, in connection with this chapter, will afford much light and valuable instruction on this subject.

2. It is ripe and ready for the ingathering. Here we learn God has a fixed time and purpose in regard to the spiritual, as he has in regard to the natural harvest; for "there is a time for every purpose under the sun." The great ingathering is "when the harvest of the earth is ripe."

3. That which is removed by the sickle is severed from the earth—taken out of the field where it grew, suggesting that in the great coming harvest, all the true wheat after the removal of the firstfruits will be taken out of the world when the harvest of the earth is ripe.

4. We learn from this also that all the saved will in the Lord's time be gathered home to glory. Not a grain of true wheat will be lost. Matt. 3: 12 is an instructive and solemn comment on this. Here is a source of sweet consolation to the bereaved, and a firm ground of assured hope to all.

VI. The last symbolic vision is seen in ver. 17-20. Here we have the Spiritual Vintage, as following upon, and contrasted with the final harvest. Another angel is seen coming out of the temple (to which heaven is here, as elsewhere, compared), and he has also a sharp sickle. And another angel is seen issuing from the altar, who has power over fire, and has apparently a judicial mission and authority. Here is concurrent action in a judicial mission. Both these we consider to be created and delegated angels, who act under the authority of him who is seated on the white cloud. The result is, the vine of the earth is gathered and doomed.

We learn from these visions three lessons: 1. The character and destiny of the future depends on the deeds and character of the present life. 2. The wheat and the vine may grow together in the earth, but there must be a final separation. 3. That our life purpose should be founded in the principle that "the first fruits belong by right unto God the Lamb."

Tired
All the time; weak, nervous, out of sorts. This is the condition of thousands in the spring. The cause is found in the blood. It is loaded with impurities. It is depleted in quality. It is thin and poor, and it fails to carry sufficient nourishment to the nerves, muscles and organs of the body. Therefore the nerves are weak, appetite is poor, and the person is "all played out." Enrich and purify the blood with Hood's Sarsaparilla, and health, vigor and vitality will return.

Small Sins.

The Accumulative Weight and Power of Sins Called Venial.

BY ALEXANDER MACLAREN, D.D.*

LEARN your minds of the notion that anything is small which offers to you the alternative of being done in a right way or in a wrong; and recognize this as a fact—"sand is weighty," trifles are of some importance. My point is this, that the accumulated pressure upon a man of a multitude of perfectly trivial faults and transgressions makes up a tremendous aggregate that weighs upon him with awful power.

Let me remind you, to begin with, that, properly speaking, the words "great" and "small" should not be applied in reference to things about which "right" and "wrong" are the proper words to employ. Or, put it into plainer language, it is as absurd to talk about the "size" of a sin, as it is to take the superficial area of a picture as a test of its greatness. The magnitude of a transgression does not depend on the greatness of the act which transgresses—according to human standards—but on the intensity with which the sinful element is working in it. For acts make trials, but motives make sins. If you take a bit of prussic acid, and bruise it, every little microscopic fragment will have the poisonous principle in it; and is very irrelevant to ask whether it is as big as a mountain or small as a grain of salt, it is a poison all the same. So to talk about magnitude in regard to sins, is to introduce a foreign consideration. But still, recognizing that there is a reality in the distinction that people make between great sins and small ones, though this superficial distinction, and does not go down to the bottom of things, let us begin with it now.

Firstly then, that small sins, by reason of their numerousness, have a terrible accumulative power. They are like the needles on our rose bushes, or the microbes that our medical friends talk so much about nowadays. Like them, their power is chiefly does not in the least degree diminish their magnitude, and, like them, they have a tremendous power of reproduction. It would be easier to find a man that had not done any one sin than to find out a man that had only done it once. And it would be easier to find a man that had done no evil than the man who had not been obliged to make the second edition of an enlarged one. For this is the great Nemesis of all evil, that it requires a portion, partly to still conscience, partly a selfish excited tastes and desires; so that natural indulgence in drink and the like type of what goes on in the inner life of every man, in so far as the second edition is stronger than the first in its tendency to produce to an equivalent effect; and so on ad infinitum.

At then remember that all our evil, however insignificant they may be, have a strange affinity with one another, so that you will find that to go on in one direction almost inevitably leads to a whole series of consequential transgressions of one sort or another. You remember the old story about the soldier who was smuggled into a fortress concealed in a hay cart, and opened the gates to a virgin citadel to his allies outside. Every evil thing, great or small, that we do into our lives, still more into our hearts is charged with the same errand as this: "Set wide the door when you are used and let us all come in after you." Herketh with him seven other spirits, for not himself, and they dwell near. "None of them," says one of the poets, describing the doleful creatures that haunt the ruins of a deserted city, "shall by any means want its mate," and the satyrs of the islands and of the woods join together, and hold high carnival in the city. And so, brethren, our little transgressions open the door for great ones and every sin makes us more accessible to the assaults of every other.

So let me remind you how here, in these little unnumbered acts of trivial transgression which scarcely produce any effect on conscience or on memory, but which so large a portion of so many of our lives, lies one of the most powerful instruments for making us what we are. If we indulge in slight acts of transgression, be sure of this, that we shall pass from them to far greater ones. For one man that leaps or falls all at once into sin which the world calls gross, there are a thousand that slide into it. The storm only blows down the trees whose hearts have been eaten out and their roots loosened. And when you see a man having a reputation for wisdom and honor all at once coming crash down and disclosing his baseness, be sure that he began with small deflections from the path of right. The evil works underground; and if we yield to little temptations, when great ones come we shall fall their victims.

Let me remind you, too, that there is another sense in which "sand is weighty." You may as well be crushed under a sandhill as under a mountain of marble. It matters not which. The accumulated weight of one is as great as that of the other. And I wish to lay upon the consciences of all that are listening to me now this thought, that an overwhelming weight of guilt results from the accumulation of little sins. Dear friends, I do not desire to preach a Gospel of fear, but I cannot help feeling that very largely in this day the ministrations of the Church is defective in that it does not give sufficient, though sad and sympathetic, prominence to the plain teaching of Christ and of the New Testament as to future retribution for present sin. We shall "every one of us give account of himself to God"; and if the account is long enough it will foot up to an enormous sum, though each item may be only halfpence. The weight of a lifetime of little sins will be enough to crush a man down with guilt and responsibility when he stands before the Judge. That is all true, and you know it, and I beseech you, take it to your hearts, "Sand is weighty." Little sins have to be accounted for, and may crush.

Faith Better Than Armies.

On the frontier of Austria, on a little stream called the Ill, is the town of Feldkirch. In 1799 when Napoleon was sweeping over the Continent, Massena, one of his generals, suddenly appeared on the heights above the town at the head of eighteen thousand men. It was Easter day, and the sun as it rose glittered on the weapons of the French, at the top of the range of hills. The council assembled to consult what was to be done. Defense was impossible and capitulation was talked of. Then the old dean of the church stood up. "It is Easter day," he said. "We have been reckoning on our own strength, and that fails. It is the day of the Lord's resurrection. Let us ring the bell and have services as usual, and leave the matter in God's hands. We know only our weaknesses and not the power of God." His word prevailed, and from the church towers in Feldkirch, the bells began to clang joyous peals in honor of the resurrection, and the streets were filled with worshippers hastening to the house of God. The French heard with surprise the sudden clangor of the bells; and concluding that an Austrian army had arrived in the night to relieve the place, Massena suddenly broke up his camp, and before the bells had ceased ringing, not a Frenchman was to be seen. Faith in God had saved the little town and all its people.

Morals in Madagascar.

As a result of the French occupation of Madagascar there has been a great increase of drinking among the Malagasy, as well as of licentiousness, and there is now much Sunday trading in the capital—a thing which had not been known there for the last twenty-five years. The Resident-General has, however, already struck a deep blow at one of the chief blots on the Malagasy civilization, and has stopped the public sale of slaves in the markets. We may hope that other measures may eventually be taken so that slavery itself may gradually come to an end.

For Nervous Exhaustion Use Horsford's Acid Phosphate.

Dr. A. L. TURNER, Bloomsburg Sanitarium, Philadelphia, Pa., says: "As an adjunct to the recuperative powers of the nervous system, I know of nothing equal to it."

To impart strength purify the blood and to give a feeling of health and vigor throughout the system, there is nothing equal to Hood's Sarsaparilla. Take only Hood's this spring.

The Blessedness of Giving.

There is a little incident which will make clear to the young people the pleasure and profit of consecrated liberality. In Connecticut a few years ago lived a lady who had a beautiful flower garden, in which she took great pride. The whole country was proud of it, too, and people drove miles to see it.

She fastened two large baskets on the outside of her fence next the road, and every morning they were filled with cut flowers—the large showy kinds in one basket and the delicate, fragile ones in the other. All the school children going by helped themselves, and studied the better for it, and the business men took a breath of fragrance into their dusty offices that helped the day along. Even the tramps were welcome to all the beauty they could get into their forlorn lives.

"You cut such quantities," some one said to her, "are'n't you afraid you will rob yourself?" The more I cut the more I have," she answered. "Don't you know that if plants are allowed to go to seed they stop blooming? I love to give pleasure, and it is profit as well for my liberal cutting is the secret of my beautiful garden. I'm like the man in Pilgrim's Progress: A man there was (though some did count him mad), The more he gave away the more he had."

Nansen and the Pole.

Dr. Frithiof Nansen's scheme was to enter the Kara Sea in his vessel, the Fram, a ship specially constructed to resist the pressure of the ice-packs, and then to proceed in the direction of the New Siberian Islands, hoping to get well into the ice during the autumn of 1893, and then to drift northward with the currents past the North Pole. It is characteristic of the man, says a writer in Travel, that he has made no provision for return in case of non-success; I will go through the other side." It is pleasant to learn that the gallant explorer so thoroughly appreciated the cordial interest taken in his expedition by the English people. It would be premature in the face of the difference of opinion among experts to express any opinion as to the truth of the report that he has reached the point desired.

He "Spoiled Israel."

The Newly Found Inscription of Pharaoh Menephtah Translated by Prof. Petrie.

ANOTHER important discovery has been recently made in Egypt by Prof. Flinders Petrie, the celebrated Egyptologist and antiquarian. It is an inscription relating to the triumphs of Merenptah (believed to be identical with Menephtah), and here for the first time the name of Israel is found on an ancient Egyptian record. This is a sad blow to many critics of Bible history, who have questioned the validity of the inspired record of Israel's sojourn in Egypt and miraculous exodus therefrom. The inscription of Merenptah is translated in Prof. Petrie's article in the May Contemporary Review; and a second inscription of the same king is mentioned by Prof. Sayce. Both mention the name of Israel as a people conquered by Merenptah in Palestine. They have been found over and over again on Assyrian monuments, but for all the monuments have thus far revealed, there might never have been such a people as Israel. Part of the inscription is as follows:

"For the sun of Egypt has wrought this change; he was born as the fated means of revenging it, the King Merenptah. Chiefs bend down, saying, 'Peace to thee;' not one of the nine bows raises his head. Vanquished are the Tahennu (N. Africans); the Khita (Hittites) are quieted; ravaged is Pa-kanana (Kanun) with all violence; taken is Askadni (Askalon?); seized in Kazmel; Yenu (Yanoh) of the Syrians is made as tho it had not existed; the people of Ysra'el is spoiled, it hath no seed; Syria has become as widows of the land of Egypt; all lands together are in peace. Every one that was a marauder hath been subdued by the King Merenptah, who gives life like the sun every day."

Professor Sayce, writing in The Athenaeum, gives this concerning the second inscription:

"Dr. Spiegelberg tells me that he has found another mention of the Israelites in another inscription of Menephtah [same as Merenptah.] It had not been noticed before, because only the first part of of the name is preserved. The name is written, l-s-i-r-a-e-l-u, with the determinatives of 'man' and 'woman.' Dr. Spiegelberg reads a paper on the inscription before the Berlin Academy at the beginning of next month. The stela is now on its way to Gizeh; but I examined it before it was removed from the place where it was found. It is curious that the Governor of Kush under Menephtah was Mesu [Moses], whose inscription has been published by Lepsius, while the high priest of Amon was Lui [Levi], and one of the Theban princes was named Pi-nehas [Phinehas] 'the Negro.'"

This, by another and equally distinguished Orientalist is corroborative of the almost simultaneous discovery by Prof. Petrie. Both are of great interest to Bible Students, even though they do not shed sufficient light to settle any chronological point as to those events in the early history of the world.

The Gospel in Egypt.

American Missionaries Doing an Excellent Work in that World-Old Land.

AN English contemporary, in a recent issue, publishes a most interesting letter from a missionary reviewing the work of the American Missions in Egypt. The writer says:

Two leading agencies at work in seeking to reach the native population are the American Presbyterian Mission and the Church Missionary Society. It is about forty years ago since the founders of the American Mission began operations in Egypt. They and their successors have labored away steadily during that time, often amid great discouragement, but they are now seeing fruit to their labors. Their work has been very largely educational, as from the first they saw that their great hope lay in getting hold of the young people. The result is that now they have not only large schools throughout the country, but have many native Christian congregations, formed very largely from the young people who have passed through their schools. At present they have from Alexandria to the first Cataract, twenty-five girls' day schools, with 2599 pupils; 135 boys' day schools, with 8179 pupils. Of these three-fourths are Copts and one-fourth are Moslems. The education given is of a very high class. Many of the pupils pass from these schools to very responsible positions under Government and elsewhere. Seeing that the Bible is read and taught, we cannot shut our eyes to the great good which must result from such means.

The Sabbath Schools, of which there are 120, with nearly 4000 pupils, are doing grand work. It was our privilege to visit two of them, one at Cairo and the other at Assiout, with over 350 and 500 children present respectively. It rejoiced our hearts to hear these brown-skinned and bright-eyed little folks singing the songs of Zion in their own language. The mission has now 190 preaching stations, with thirty-six organized native congregations, and a membership of 5004, showing an increase last year by profession of faith of 577, out of which four were Moslems. There are twenty-two native preachers, some of whom are very able and eloquent men. We heard one preach at Assiout to an attentive native congregation of 500. The native colporteurs, of which there are twenty-seven, visit the towns and villages, where no other agency exists, selling Bibles, Testaments, religious books, etc. This branch of the work is giving every evidence of God's blessing upon it. We give one case in particular, where a Bible was bought by a young Moslem, and now there are ten meeting together in the same village to study it, in face of great persecution. There is a large mission college at Assiout, for the training of young men who are to become teachers and preachers; it is presided over by Dr. Alexander. There is also a medical mission at Assiout, where nearly 20,000 patients are treated annually, and to many of them the Gospel is preached. Zenana work is carried on throughout the country by Bible readers, together with night-schools and several other agencies.

The "Nightingale" Psalm.

The 23rd Psalm has been called the Nightingale Psalm, because it sings in the Valley of the Shadow; the 103rd Psalm is like the note of the lark sounding from a clear morning sky. It is a song of renewal, of delight in the blessings of health, of recovery, forgiveness and restored fellowship with God. One clear note of gratitude sounds throughout, faithful to its keynote in the face of all that is saddest and darkest in life. Some of the passages touch the high-water mark of sacred poetry, as where the sweetness of forgiving love and the pathos of life's transformation are described. In this glorious season, the psalm may fitly voice the Christian's delight in the natural blessings of life, crowned with the thought of the Divine mercy and compassion as shown in the spiritual gifts of his grace.

China's Change of Front.

Imperial Proclamation Approving the Work of the Christian Missionaries.

CHINA is coming to Christ, and the labors and earnest prayers of God's people for many years are at last bearing fruit. Rev. Geo. H. Ewing, a missionary of the American Board at Pao-ting-fu, north China, has translated and forwarded to this country, an imperial decree, recently issued by the Secretary of State, which proves distinctly more than anything that has yet been done that the cause of the Gospel has won a splendid triumph in China, and that the era of Christian oppression has passed away. This proclamation says:

"In order to clearly inform the public concerning foreign merchants and missionaries in China: The pledge of the Court to protect foreigners is recorded in the edicts which officers and civilians alike must observe as evidence of peaceful feeling. But the country people do not understand the Court's friendliness to the foreigner nor the Western teacher's custom of propagating their Church. They are of a suspicious mind, and local roughs search for opportunity to plunder circulate false stories, thereby inciting further doubts until the people pass from suspicion to hatred and then to open outbreaks. After the deed is done the truth is examined into and the rumors all found slanderous. The culprits have plundered to the full and have disappeared while dutiful people suffer ill-repute, and the Government moreover on account of the affair is obliged to make redress. The foreigner is grateful for the Emperor's kindness and danger is pacified, but at heart he is not satisfied. Foreign countries are all ill-treated and consult privately.

"Accordingly China has certain doctrine of instruction to set forth whereby the people may receive for many hundreds of years the favor of the Emperor. Is it right when there is sudden discord between the people and foreigners to disregard the edict of the Emperor and to destroy the unity of the nation?

"Western teachers have come many thousands of miles over mountains and through seas in order to exhort men to righteousness and spread abroad their Church. We inhabitants of this Eastern land ought, in accordance with what is right, to have respect in all matters for the foreigners, thus manifesting the benevolent spirit of China. If suddenly an outbreak should occur one ought also to bring the case before the local official, who should manage the affair with justice. Thus would justice be obtained. Persistently to disregard everything, to believe rumors, and to rashly manage the matter—is that right? I often think that the root of the Church's grievance is not necessarily in the fact that those outside the Church held in contempt the church members, but that it is probably because local roughs egg on otherwise well disposed people, and also because they do not understand whence sprang the motives of preaching. In examining the three foreign churches, we see that although the names are not the same, they are fundamentally one; being alike in the God they worship, the Old and New Testaments which they read, and in their good works, such as educating children, opening schools and hospitals. The only difference is in their rules of preaching. The spirit of their preaching is that of mutual fellowship, exchange of thought and common love and there is nothing whatever underhand about it. These Churches have been in existence for over 1800 years. The expenses of the Church are all met either from the contributions of the members or from the treasures of the country. The ministers are selected on the basis of ability and scholarship; they must first pass an examination, after which they may be permitted to come to China. The men whom the Church has commissioned have not been sent by their Government nor have one to seek office. For their Jesus left them a charge, that whoever entered the Church must proclaim far and wide, thus maintaining their faith and love. Otherwise one, though he had entered the Church, could not be classed among the elect. So it is, that now the ministers of the Church are not only in Europe and America, but are also preaching far and wide in Asia.

"In view of all these things we see that they have come to China to preach, not fearing danger or distance and not loving earthly treasure. Consider for a moment. If there were among them those who were as rumor reports, how could preaching have continued for so long or have extended so widely or have won so many followers? Hereafter we may be aware that the Church is not alone established in China, nor are the missionaries who come to China all from one country. We should also know that every country looks upon the Church as of the greatest importance. I have made careful examination of the Emperor's edict of five years ago to the effect that foreign missionaries are here to exhort the people to righteousness and to peacefulness; and also to the disturbances in Ching Su, Ch'eh Kiang and Sz'Chuen. I respect the Emperor's order that the culprits be seized and the Church be protected."

A Successful Industrial Work.

The Industrial Missionary Association of Alabama has had a successful year. Its work at Beloit, Ala., is among the most isolated, neglected, and needy negroes. Its plan is to afford a business chance with needful training. The Association designs to give nothing in mere charity but everything in teaching, counsel, and opportunity. Colored people can rent actual farms and homes with strict account and drill for honesty in paying and economy and thrift in common life. These renters, if ostensibly married, must live in lawful wedlock, and the effort is to train them in home-getting and home-making. In the face of business depression, the actual revenues from lands, store, and mills during 1895 were sufficient to sustain all the Association missionary work and leave a balance on hand. With sixty-five families actually renting, and one day-school in three departments, two other common schools, two night-schools, enrolling 250 pupils, three churches sustained or actively aided, four Sunday schools and prayer-meetings, and various other gatherings, one white farm superintendent, and one white mill superintendent, the cost of all these to the Association has been more than equalled by its business revenues. All communications and inquiries should be addressed to Rev. C. B. Curtis, Beloit, Dallas co., Alabama.

Armenian Relief Work.

Recent cable advices from Armenia are less pacific and would seem to indicate a renewal of the troubles in certain districts. Over fifteen hundred Armenians have lately been imprisoned by the Sultan's order, that tyrannical ruler dreading a similar fate to that of the Shah of Persia. Many of the students at the Armenian college in Galata have been sentenced to twenty years imprisonment each, for having in their possession subscription lists for the relief of the Armenians in Zeitoun.

The pupils of the Minneapolis Public Schools have contributed $633 for the relief of the Armenian sufferers. The sum was made up in a week's time and most of the money came in pennies and nickels. It was sent to the National Armenian Relief Committee. It seems very appropriate that the children in this happy and favored land, should join in the effort to help the children in a less-favored country.

Doings in Jerusalem.

The Celebration of the Passover Feast—A Missionary Assaulted in Bethany.

FROM a correspondent of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in Jerusalem, the following letter has been received:

JERUSALEM, April 7, '96.

On the 15th day of Nisan, corresponding this year, to March 29, the Jews observed the Feast of Passover, in commemoration of two events which followed each other within two days; first, the sparing of the first-born of the Israelites, when the first-born of the Egyptians was smitten (on which account is called Pesach, or "passing over"), and in commemoration of the Exodus from Egypt in such haste that they had no time to leaven, hence, "The Feast of Unleavened Bread." The Passover was observed on the 14th and eaten in the evening, and the Feast of Unleavened Bread lasted from the 15th to the 22d. The rites and ceremonies connected with its observance amongst the strict Jews are as follows: Some days beforehand, the business of preparing the Matzoth or Passover Cake is entered upon. The wheat is first examined for the purpose of seeing whether there is any admixture of other seeds, or of grains already giving signs of sprouting by reason of being exposed to moisture. The grain thus selected is ground in a clean mill under the supervision of men appointed by the Rabbi and the community. A large oven is then heated several times in order to destroy every trace of chametz (leavened bread or substances akin to it). This being done, the families come together for the purpose of kneading and baking the matzoth. Every vessel used must be new, or at least used for no other purpose, and never touched by chametz. When the kneader has prepared the dough, it is cut in pieces and distributed to those who are to assist in making it up. These roll it out as thin as possible, and when this has been done a young man goes round with a little instrument consisting of a handle with a revolving pointed wheel, with which he punctures the cake in various directions. This is done that the dough may not rise or bulge out when put into the oven. Owing to the thinness of the cake it is quickly baked.

On the evening of the 15th day of Nisan, the father of the family takes in his hand a wax-candle and a small brush (generally consisting of a few feathers tied together), with which he goes to the corners of various rooms, collecting or sweeping together a few crumbs which had been previously left there, and as he gathers them he says a short prayer. These crumbs he puts carefully aside till the next forenoon, when the second part of the ritual is performed, that of burning, and thus removing the chametz, on which occasion another prayer is said. In the meantime the house has been thoroughly cleansed of every trace of leavened bread, and now nothing leavened may be eaten till the conclusion of the festival. In the afternoon this is done. The wine is put into flagons. The charoseth—a mixture of apples pounded up with cinnamon (the cinnamon represents the straw mixed with the clay), and other spices is prepared, in commemoration of the clay which the Israelites used for brick-making in Egypt. Into this compound, "bitter herbs" (maror) are to be dipped as commemorating the bitterness of their bondage. Besides this, some parsley or celery is procured, which is to be eaten, having been dipped in salt water. The Paschal Lamb and festive sacrifice are represented by a roasted bone and a roasted egg.

Next, three Matzoth are placed, one on another, in a pile and wrapped in the folds of a napkin. The upper is termed "Priest," the middle "Levite," and the lower "Israelite." A couch or bed is prepared for the father or head of the family to recline upon, this being a symbol of freedom. When darkness comes on, all go to the synagogue to say the evening prayer.

An English lady missionary about sixty-five years old, has been living for several years in Bethany (the home of Mary and Martha). On Easter Sunday, about 10 P.M. after supper, she retired, and her companion, an English lady, about twenty-one years old, also retired to her room. The second is a Mohammedan, but it was supposed by our lady missionaries that he was a converted Christian. He was downstairs and immediately after shutting the door of the house, provided himself with a rope and a knife. He knocked at the room of the young lady and told her she was wanted; the elderly lady heard him speaking to her companion and called to her, "No, you are not wanted;" but her friend did not hear her and she appeared in the sitting-room. The servant's desire was to have the two together in one room. He tried to bind the two with a rope, but was powerless to do so. However, he succeeded in throwing the elderly lady on the ground and cut her on the neck. The young lady caught his hand but could not stop him and her fingers were badly cut. She left the room, running downstairs and shouting for the villagers of Bethany for help; but to her great surprise she found the door closed. Meantime, the servant seeing the blood running from his employer's neck, left her with the idea that she was slaughtered. He then caught the girl by her hair and twisted it around his hand and he brought her back to the room to slaughter her. Fortunately the cut on the old lady's throat was only skin deep. She drew near the door and closed it, and when the servant brought the girl he found the door shut. The young girl shouted to her friend to give the man some money, and on receiving 120 francs he left the house and ran off in the direction of Jerusalem. When he came to the cemetery of the Jews, which is near to the garden of Gethsemane, he fell and broke his leg and was carried by some people, passing by early in the morning, to the Russian hospital.

The two ladies were in a sad plight. The blood from their wounds kept running till next morning, when the young girl went up to the roof of the house and shouted for the villagers of Bethany to come for help. The news was sent at once to the British Consul of Jerusalem and with an English doctor, the women were both carried to the English hospital and placed under the care of Dr. Wheeler. The servant was brought from the hospital and imprisoned at once.

"The River of Death."

Death is frequently pictured as a river to be crossed, but for the Christian its stream holds no terrors, for he is assured that he will be safely led to the further side. Miss Williams, a missionary in China, writing of a visit to Paoning, says: "I was taken into a hut where a poor woman was dying. Quite alone, and eighty-seven years old, she lay on straw on the mud floor, covered over with rags and straw. She had no one to care for her, her nearest relation being a niece living some 40 away, who came once a day with a bowl of rice. When the poor old woman saw me she said:

"My sins are great, and so I have this trouble. I am crossing a river, but not on a bridge; I am falling in." The Chinese have the idea that at death a river has to be crossed. If during life they have done good, they will go over by a bridge; if evil, they will fall into the river. Thank God! I could tell her that there was one called Jesus, who loved her and bore her sins; he could take her safely across the river. Oh! why do not more Christians come out and help to give the Gospel to these people? Hardly one of the hundreds with whom I have come in contact this week had ever heard of Jesus before."

A Sacramental Hymn.

COME, my soul, in true devotion,
Turn thee from the world aside,
And behold with fond emotion
Him who for thy ransom died.
At his table hear him saying:
"Eat this bread and drink this wine."
Lo, the words, his love portraying,
Beam with light and truth divine!
Gracious Lord, thine invitation,
All unworthy, I obey.
With thy flock I choose my station
While with thee we feast to-day.

SCIATICA.

AUGUSTA, GA., July 16, 1894.

For two years I had not been free from sciatic pains, and sometimes they were so severe that I would jump out of bed while asleep. I spent a large amount for special treatment, and was sixty-seven times cauterized with a white-hot iron. Hearing that a partner of Gen. Alger, of Detroit, had been cured by the Electropoise, I determined to try it. At that time I was almost helpless and could not walk to my office. One year's use of the Electropoise cured me, and I have been free from sciatica for three years now. I would not take $5,000 for the Electropoise if I could not get another.

INDIGESTION.

WHITESTONE (L.I.), N.Y., July 10, '95.
For years I had been a great sufferer from indigestion, so that a times I could neither eat nor sleep, and life became a burden. I employed several noted physicians in and around New York, and spent hundreds of dollars for medicine.

Through a friend I was induced to try the Electropoise. When I began its use I was unable to sleep or even lie down more than two hours each night. It was some time before the Electropoise made any favorable impression, but I kept at it, following directions closely. I have now more use for the stomach tube; eat three meals per day; sleep like a child from seven to eight hours per night, and enjoy life.

THE GOSPEL AMONG THE RANCHMEN.

Sunday School Missionaries Write of their Experiences on the Frontier — Rough Lives Ennobled by Christianity — Saving and Training the Frontier Children.

AN INCIDENT OF WESTERN RANCH LIFE—MARKING THE CATTLE.

THERE is probably no single class of evangelical missionary work, the world over, which covers a wider

as any states. Big and little, men and women, all are interested in the work of the Sunday School Union missionaries.

nationalities, demands such patience and perseverance, and involves so many contrasting experiences, as that which has been going on for the last seventy years, and is still successfully and energetically prosecuted by the American Sunday School Union missionaries. It is a work that makes the consecrated individual worker up and down the boundaries of a parish that may be as large as a European principality. He meets there representatives of the nationalities of Europe and Asia and the islands of the ocean, as well as the natives of his own country—the white man, the red, and the black.

His immediate territory is part of a great camping-ground, extending from Mexico to Alaska, from the shores of the Pacific, inland, till it reaches the mid-continent and beyond, and his co-workers form an army of Christian men and women who are devoting their lives to uplifting the Gospel standard in the remotest corners of our land.

These missionaries work especially in the scattered neighborhoods at the edge of the new settlements—places where no one has interest enough to carry on the Gospel work, and where the people are not sufficiently interested to support or even to start a religious work. To such localities every trained missionary goes with as much relish as the city pastor does to his pulpit. People how, breaks the home training and its influences. Sunday becomes a visiting day, where men and women, who have been separated for a week or more, can camp together, renew associations and learn the latest news. These camps may be found all over the West. No better hearted men can be found anywhere. They have a rough, hard life of it and are not polished in their manners; yet they scorn anything but the pure Christianity. Always on the alert, they are good students of human nature and can judge the character of a man almost at sight. Once make a friend of them and you will find them as true as the trained ponies they love to ride so well.

One of the A. S. S. U. missionaries, Mr. Frank Kiser of Downs, Kans., writes us this interesting description of mission and Sunday School work in the newer portions of his State. To the class of people among whom he labors, "the little school-house on the hill-side becomes to them a church. A person wrote to me they had no preacher, and so we commenced prayer-meetings all by ourselves. We had blessed meetings and three boys, whom we could not get last winter, came to the Lord. We prayed much over them and thought we never would get them. I know one of these men who left a Christian home in the State of New York when a boy, and swear to my mother's prayers. For ten years, back in the State of New York, she has been praying for me, and to-night her prayers have been answered. I am going back to her in her old days, to stay with her and to comfort her.' A few days afterward he did start, and let us hope that he is cheering the closing hours of a sainted mother's life.

"Like hundreds of others in our mission schools, two rough boys attended the school from Sabbath to Sabbath coming on horseback with other boys. True, they supported a widowed mother, but, like the others, they blasphemed, ran horses and desecrated the Sabbath day. But the seed that was sown in the school was not lost for at our meeting one night, I noticed an aged lady come tottering in to the crowded house, leaning on the arm of a young man that I took to be her son, as he was so kind to her. In the testimony meeting at the close of the service he arose and said: 'I was out husking corn to-day and was thinking about the sermon of last night. I just knelt down and gave myself to Christ. I came to the house about 11 o'clock and as I came in I asked mother to go to church to-night. Then she looked through her glasses with, 'John, what do you mean? What is the matter with you?' And I told her that I had been converted. Then she took me in her arms and I thought she would never let go of me.' When he was seated, the mother got up and told of her pleadings with the Lord for her boys and how happy she was that one had found peace in Christ. But oh! would we not pray for the other son who was still a who have come from the old settlements often seem to lose all interest when coming to such places. Especially is this true of the men. The rough, outdoor life, some-came to the West to seek his fortune. In his wanderings he came to one of our meetings for a few nights and was converted. In his testimony he said: 'This is in an

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

Flowers on Northern and Southern Graves.

A Sermon Preached by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., at Washington, D. C., on the Text: Solomon's Song 4: 4, "The tower of David builded for an armory, whereon there hang a thousand bucklers, all shields of mighty men."

THE Church is here compared to an armory, the walls hung with trophies of dead heroes. Walk all about this tower of David, and see the dented shields and the twisted swords, and the rusted helmets of terrible battle. So at this season, a month earlier at the South, a month later at the North, the American churches are turned into armories adorned with memories of departed braves. Blossom and bloom, O walls, with stories of self-sacrifice, and patriotism, and prowess!

By unanimous decree of the people of the United States of America, the graves of all the Northern and Southern dead are every year decorated. All acerbity and bitterness have gone out of the national solemnity, and as the men and women of the South one month ago floralized the cemeteries and graveyards, so yesterday we, the men and women of the North, put upon the tombs of our dead the kiss of patriotic affection. Bravery always appreciates bravery, though it fight on the other side: and if a soldier of the Federal army had been a month ago at Savannah, he would not have been ashamed to march in the floral processions to the cemetery. And if yesterday a Confederate soldier was at Arlington, he was glad to put a sprig of heart's-ease on the silent heart of our dead.

In a battle during our last war, the Confederates were driving back the Federals, who were in swift retreat, when a Federal officer dropped wounded. One of his men stopped at the risk of his life, and put his arms around the officer to carry him from the field. Fifty Confederate muskets were aimed at the young man who was picking up the officer. But the Confederate captain shouted, "Hold! don't fire! That fellow is too brave to shoot." And as the Federal officer, held up by his private soldier, went limping slowly off the field, the Confederates gave three cheers for the brave private; and just before the two disappeared behind a barn, both the wounded officer and the brave private lifted their caps in gratitude to the Confederate captain.

Shall the Gospel be less generous than the world? We stack arms, the bayonet of our Northern gun facing this way, the bayonet of the Southern gun facing the other way, and as the gray of the morning melts into the blue of noon, so the typical gray and blue of old war times have blended at last, and they quote in the language of King James' translation without any revision: "Glory to God in the highest, and on earth, peace, good-will to men." Now what do we mean by this great ob-

First, we mean instruction to one whole generation. Subtract 1865, when the war ended, from our 1866, and you will realize that a vast number of people were born into the world, never to know what it was to have no vivid appreciation. No one under forty-one years of age has any adequate memory of that prolonged horror. Do you remember it? "Well," you say, "I only remember that mother swooned away while she was reading the newspaper, and that they brought my father home wrapped in the flag, and that a good many people came in the house to pray, and mother faded away after that until again there were many people in the house and they told me she was dead."

There are others who cannot remember the roll of a drum or the tramp of a regiment, or a sigh or a tear of that tornado of woe that swept the nation again and again until there was one dead in each house. Now it is the religious duty of those who do remember it to tell those who do not. My young friends, there were such partings at rail-car windows and steamboat wharves, and at front doors of comfortable homes as I pray God you may never witness. Oh, what a time it was, when fathers and mothers gave up their sons, never expecting to see them again, and never did see them again until they came back mutilated, and crushed, and dead!

Four years of blood. Four years of hostile experiences. Four years of ghastliness. Four years of grave-digging. Four years of funerals, coffins, shrouds, hearses, dirges. Mourning! mourning! mourning! It was hell let loose. What a time of waiting for news! Morning paper and evening paper scrutinized for intelligence from the boys at the front. First, announcement that the battle must occur the next day. Then the news of the battle's going on. On the following day still going on. Then news of thirty thousand slain, and of the names of the great generals who had fallen, but no news about the private soldiers. Waiting for news! After many days a load of wounded going through the town or city, but no news from our boy. Then a long list of wounded and a long list of the dead, and a long list of the missing. And among the last list, our boy.

When missing? How missing? Who saw him last? Missing! Missing! Was he in the woods or by the stream? How was he hurt? Missing! missing! What burning prayers that he may yet be heard from. In that awful waiting for news many a life perished. The strain of anxiety was too great. That wife's brain gave way that first week after the battle, and ever and anon she walks the floor of the asylum or looks out of the window as though she expected some one to come along the path and up the steps, as she soliloquizes, "Missing! missing!"

What made matters worse, all this might have been avoided. There was no more need of that war than at this moment I should plunge a dagger through your heart. There were a few Christian philanthropists in those days, scoffed at both by North and South, who had the right of it. If they had been heard on both sides we should have had no war and no slavery. It was advised by those Christian philanthropists, "Let the North pay no money for the slaves as property, and set them free." The North said, "We cannot afford to pay." The South said, "We will not sell the slaves anyhow." But the North did pay in war expenses enough to purchase the slaves, and the South was compelled to give up slavery anyhow. Might not the North better have paid the money and saved the lives of five hundred thousand brave men, and might not the South better have sold out slavery and saved her five hundred thousand brave men? I swear you by the graves of your fathers and brothers, and sons to a new hatred for—the champion curse of the universe—war! O Lord, God, with the hottest bolt of thine omnipotent indignation, strike that monster down forever and ever. Imprison it in the deepest dungeon of the eternal penitentiary. Bolt it in with all the iron ever forged in cannon or moulded into howitzers. Cleave it with all the sabres that ever glittered in battle, and wring its soul with all the pangs which it ever caused. Let it feel all the conflagrations of the homesteads it ever destroyed. Deeper down let it fall, and in fiercer flame let it burn, till it has gathered into its heart all the suffering of eternity as well as time. In the name of the millions of graves of its victims, I denounce it. The nations need more the spirit of treaty and less of the spirit of war.

War is more ghastly now than once, not only because of the greater destructiveness of its weaponry, but because now it takes down the best men, whereas once it chiefly took down the worst. Bruce in 1717, in his Institutions of Military Law, said of the European armies of his day: "If all infamous persons and such as have committed capital crimes, heretics, atheists, and all dastardly feminine men, were weeded out of the army, it would soon be reduced to a pretty moderate number." Flogging and mean pay made them still more ignoble. Officers were appointed to see that each soldier drank his ration of a pint of spirits a day. There were noble men in battle, but the moral character of the army then was ninety-five per cent. lower than the moral character of an army to-day. By so much is war now the more detestable because it destroys the picked men of the nations.

Again, by this national ceremony we mean to honor courage. Many of these departed soldiers were volunteers, not conscripts, and many of those who were drafted might have provided a substitute or got off on furlough or have deserted. The fact that they lie in their graves is proof of their bravery. Brave at the front, brave at the cannon's mouth, brave on lonely picket duty, brave in cavalry charge, brave before the surgeon, brave in the dying message to the home circle. We yesterday put a garland on the brow of courage. The world wants more of it.

The Church of God is in woeful need of men who can stand under fire. The lion of worldly derision roars and the sheep tremble. In great reformatory movements at the first shot how many fall back! The great obstacle to the Church's advancement is the inanity, the vacuity, the soft prettiness, the mamby-pambyism of professed Christians. Great on a parade, cowards in battle. Afraid of getting their plumes ruffled, they carry a parasol over their helmet. They go into battle not with warriors' gauntlet but with kid gloves, not clutching the sword-hilt too tight lest the glove split at the back.

In all our reformatory and Christian work the great want is more backbone, more mettle, more daring, more prowess. We would in all our churches like to trade off a hundred do-nothings for one do-everything. "Quit yourselves like men, be strong."

They count not this glorious war
Shall conquer, though they die;
They see the triumph from afar,
And gaze it with their eye.

Again, we mean by this national observance to honor self-sacrifice for others. To all these departed men, home and kindred were as dear as our home and kindred are to us. Do you know how they felt? Just as you and I would feel starting out tomorrow morning with nine chances out of ten against our returning alive; for the telligent soldier sees not only battle but malarial sickness and exhaustion. Had these men chosen, they could have spent last night in their homes, and to have been seated where you are. They chose the camp, not because they liked better than their own house, and followed the drum and fife, not because they were better music than the voices of the domestic circle. South Mountain and Murfreesboro, and the swamps of Chickahomney were not play-grounds.

These heroes risked and lost all for others. There is no higher sublimity than that. To keep three quarters for oneself and give one quarter to others is honorable. To divide even with others is generous. To keep nothing for ourselves and give all for others is magnanimity. Christ-like. Put a girdle around your body, then measure the girdle and see if you are fifty or sixty inches round. And is that the circle of your sympathies—the size of yourself? Or, to measure you around the heart, would it take a girdle large enough to encircle the land and encircle the world? You want to know what we dry theologians mean when we talk of vicarious suffering. Look at the soldiers' graves and find out. Vicarious! pangs for other wounds for others, homesickness for others, blood for others, sepulchre for others.

Those who visited the national cemeteries at Arlington Heights and at Richmond and Gettysburg saw one inscription on soldiers' tombs oftener repeated than any other—Unknown. When, about twenty-one years ago, I was called to deliver the oration at Arlington Heights, Washington, I was not so much impressed with the minute guns that shook the earth or with the attendance of President and Cabinet and foreign ministers and generals of the army and commodores of the navy as with the pathetic and overwhelming suggestiveness of that epitaph on many graves at my feet. Unknown! Unknown! It seems to me that the time must come when the Government of the United States shall take off that epitaph. They are no more unknown! We have found them out at last. They are the loved sons of the Republic.

Would it not be well to take the statue of the heathen goddess off the top of the Capitol (for I have no faith in the morality of a heathen goddess) and put one great statue in all our national cemeteries—statue of liberty in the form of a Christian woman with her hand on an open Bible and her foot on the Rock of Ages, with the other hand pointing down to the graves of the unknown, saying, "They are my sons who died that I might live. Take off the misnomer. Everybody know them. It is of comparatively little importance what was the name given them at baptism of water. In the holier and mightier baptism of blood we know them, and yesterday the nation put both arms around them and hugged them to her heart, crying, 'Mine forever!'"

Again, by this national ceremony we mean the future defence of this nation. Every wreath of flowers on the soldier's graves we say, "Those who die for their country shall not be forgotten," and they will give enthusiasm to our young men to case our nation should in the future need to defend itself in battle. We shall never have another war between North and South. The old decayed bone of contention, American slavery, has been cast out although here and there a depraved politician takes it up to see if he can't gnaw something off it. We are floating off farther and farther from the possibility of sectional strife.

No possibility of civil war. But about foreign invasion I am not so certain. When I spoke against war I said nothing against self-defence. An inventor told me that he had invented a style of weapon which could be used in self-defence but not in aggressive warfare. I said, "When you get the nations to adopt that weapon you have introduced the millennium." I have no right to go on my neighbor's premises and assault him, but if some ruffian break into my house for the assassination of my family and I can borrow a gun and load it in five minutes and aim it straight enough, I will shoot.

There is no room on this continent for another nation—except Canada, and a poorer neighbor no one ever had. If you do not think so, go to Montreal and Toronto and see how well they will treat you. Over than that there is absolutely no room for any other nation. I have been across the continent again and again, and know that we have not a half inch of ground for the gouty foot of foreign despotism to stand on. But I am not so sure that some of the arrogant nations of Europe may not some day challenge us. I do not know that those forts around New York Bay are to sleep all through the next century. I do not know that Barnegat Light house will not yet look off upon a hostile navy. I do not know but that a half dozen nations, envious of our prosperity, may want to give us a wrestle. During the civil war there were two or three nations that could hardly keep their hands off us. It is very easy to pick national quarrels, and if our nation escapes much longer it will be the exception.

foreign foe should come, we want men like those of 1812 and like those of 1862 to meet them. We want them all up and down the coast, Pulaski and Fort Sumter in the same chorus of thunder as Fort Lafayette and Fort Hamilton. Men who will not only know how to fight, but how to die. When such a time comes, if it ever does come, the generation on the stage of action will say, "My country will care for my family as they did in the soldiers' asylums for the orphans in the civil war, and my country will honor my dust as it honored those who preceded me in patriotic sacrifice, and once a year at any rate, on Decoration Day, I shall be resurrected into the remembrance of those for whom I died. He! I go for God and my country! Huzzah!"

foreign foe should come, the old sectional animosities would have no power. He go our regiments into the battle-field: Tenth New York volunteers, Tenth Alabama cavalry, Fourteenth Pennsylvania infantry, Tenth Massachusetts artillery, Tenth South Carolina sharpshooters. I do not know but it may require the attack of some foreign foe to make us forget our old sectional wrangling. I have no faith in the cry, "No North, no South, no East, no West." Let all four sections keep their peculiarities and their preferences, each doing its own work and not interfering with each other, each of the four carrying its part in the great harmony—the bass, the alto, the tenor, the soprano—in the grand march of Union.

Once more, this great national ceremony means the beautification of the tombs, whether of those who fell in battle or accident, or who have expired in their beds on our arms or on our laps. I suppose you have noticed that many of the families take this season as the time for the adornment of their family plots. This national observance has secured the arboriculture and floriculture of the cemeteries, the straightening up of many a slab planted thirty or forty years ago, and has swept the scythe through the long grass and half-obiterated epitaph. This day is the benediction of the resting-place of father, mother, son, daughter, brother, sister.

It is all that we can do for them now. Make their resting-places attractive, not adorned with costly outlay, but in quiet remembrance. You know how. If you can afford only one flower, that will do. It shows what you would do if you could. Let the blossom from you may mean more to the Duke of Wellington's catafalque. Oh, we cannot afford to forget them. They were so lovely to us. We miss them so much. We will never get over it. Blessed Lord Jesus, comfort our broken hearts. From every bank of flowers breathes promise of resurrection.

In olden times the Hebrews, returning from their burial place, used to pluck the grass from the field three or four times, then throw it over their heads, suggestive of the resurrection. We pick not the grass, but the flowers, and instead of throwing them over our heads we place them before our eyes, right down over the silent heart that once beat with warmest love toward us, or over the still feet that ran to service, or over the lips from which we took the kiss at the anguish of the last parting.

But stop! We are not infidels. Our bodies will soon join the bodies of our departed in the tomb, and our spirits shall join their spirits in the land of the rising sun. We cannot long be separated. Instead of crying with Jacob for Joseph, "I will go down into the grave unto my son, mourning," let us cry with David. "I shall go to him."

On one of the gates of Greenwood is the quaint inscription: "A night's lodging on the way to the city of the New Jerusalem." Comfort one another with these words. May the hand of him who shall wipe away all tears from all eyes wipe your cheek with its softest tenderness. The Christ of Mary, and Martha, and Lazarus will enfold you in his arms. The white-robed angels who sat at the tomb of Jesus will yet roll the stone from the door of your dead in radiant resurrection. The Lord himself shall descend from Heaven with a shout and the voice of the archangel. So the Dead March in Saul shall become the Hallelujah Chorus.

An Opportunity in Calcutta.

CHRISTIAN work among the college students of India has a prospect of increased facilities in the new and imposing structure which the Young Men's Christian Association is trying to purchase.

If some American millionaire who takes an interest in missionary work, would come to the help of the Association with a gift of fifty thousand dollars, he would be doing a service which would have far-reaching results. The Young Men's Christian Association in Calcutta has proved its need of better quarters. It is located at present in a private house which is as commodious as the funds available will allow, but already it has proved so utterly inadequate that more young men have gone away for lack of accommodation than have been received. They have come from the twelve principal colleges of Calcutta, and the Visitors' register shows that they belong to nearly one hundred towns and villages scattered over Bengal. If these young men could all have been received as members, there would have been a rare prospect of missionary evangelization. When during their vacation and at the conclusion of their college course they return to their homes, they might have carried with them Christian principles which would have made them centres of Christian influence. That the opportunity should have been missed was a great grief to the managers of the Association. They longed for more room and better facilities.

At this juncture, when the need was so urgently felt, the opportunity of supplying it occurred. The Government desired to dispose of the building, a picture of which appears on this page. It was erected as a hospital for native women, but for that purpose its location was a disadvantage. It is too conspicuous. It stands on the great boulevard which the Government recently cut from the terminus of the East Indian railroad, straight through the most crowded native quarter, to the terminus of another important railroad on the opposite side of the city. Within five minutes' walk of it are six large colleges, each containing from six hundred to a thousand students, and these students pass the building every time they visit the athletic grounds in Marcus Square. A most unsuitable site for a woman's hospital in a land where woman's life, and especially a sick woman's life, is made extremely secluded. But the very characteristics which rendered the site unsuitable for that purpose, recommend it for a young Men's Christian Association. The Association fully appreciated its advantages and the Government being friendly to its work, offered to sell it to the Association at a lower price than could have been obtained in the open market. The fifty thousand dollars, however, that it is necessary to raise for the purchase, put it beyond the reach of the Association. Mr. D. McConaughy, Jr., the General Secretary of the India National Union has therefore returned to this country to lay the opportunity before the generous, wealthy givers, who know how much good such institutions are doing in our own land. We sincerely hope that among them will be found some who will enable the Association to avail itself of this grand opportunity of adding to its facilities. It is distinctly a missionary work, inasmuch as it will enable the Association to reach that class of young men who in a few years will exert a paramount influence on the natives of India.

His First Prayer.

It is related of the celebrated preacher, Rev. Rowland Hill, that he was one day overtaken by a storm and compelled to pass the night at a village inn. At a late hour the landlord sent a request by the waiter that the guest would go to bed. Mr. Hill replied: "I have been waiting a long time expecting to be called to family prayers." "Family prayers!" replied the waiter, "I don't know what you mean, sir; we never have such things here." "Indeed! then tell your master I cannot go to bed until we have family prayers."

The waiter informed his master, who, in consternation, came hurriedly into the room and said: "Sir, I wish you to go to bed; I cannot go until I have seen all the lights out, I am so afraid of fire." "So am I," was the reply, "but I have been expecting to be summoned to family prayers." "All very well, sir, but it cannot be done here." "Indeed! Then pray get my horse, I cannot sleep in a house where there is no prayer."

The host, however, preferred to dismiss his prejudice rather than his guest, and said: "I have no objection to have a prayer, but I do not know how." "Well, then," said Mr. Hill, "summon all your people, and let us see what can be done." The landlord obeyed, and in a few minutes the astonished domestics were upon their knees, and the landlord was called upon to pray. "Sir," said the landlord, "I never prayed in my life; I don't know how to pray." "Ask God to teach you," was the gentle reply. The landlord said, folding his hands: "God, teach us how to pray." "That is my prayer, my friend," cried Mr. Hill, joyfully, "go on." "I am sure I don't know what to say now, sir." "Yes you do; God has taught you how to pray; now thank him for it." The man responded, "Thank you, God Almighty, for letting me pray to you." "Amen! amen!" exclaimed Mr. Hill, who then prayed himself.

Twenty years afterward he found in that village a place of worship and a school, as the result of that first prayer.

PERSIA'S NEW RULER.

MUZAFFER-ED-DEEN, the new occupant of the throne of Persia, was during the last year of his father's life, Governor of Azerbaijan. His mother was the royal wife of the Shah Nasr-ed-Deen. Little is known of the abilities of the new SHAH MUZAFFER-ED-DEEN.

Shah, but an English member of Parliament, Mr. G. N. Curzon, who was in Persia from 1889 to 1892, states that he is a man of good intelligence, and by no means one to be easily coerced either by Russia or any other power. It is claimed by others, however, that Muzaffer is a strong Russophile and that his reign will witness the decline of British influence in Persia. While Governor of Azerbaijan, his friendship with Russia was so manifest as to incur his father's displeasure. He has been enthroned at Tabriz and the new regime seems to have been received with general approval. Amin-es-Sultan, who was Grand Vizier under the late Shah, has been retained in that position.

The new Shah, whose portrait appears on this page, is forty-three years of age. He is a tall, strongly-built man, and a keen sportsman like his father. His rule in the Azerbaijan province was very popular. He has been more or less of a student and a close observer of events throughout the world. His acquaintance with politics, though not so extensive as was his father's, is still something remarkable for an Oriental prince, who has been but little out of his own country.

It is estimated that the personal wealth of the new Shah is somewhere between $200,000,000 and $250,000,000. In one apartment of his palace, it is said, is a collection of pearls, rubies, emeralds, and other precious stones of fabulous value. Shah Muzaffer is personally handsome and dignified in appearance, with regular features and a kindly expression. He has broad and liberal ideas and has made the most of his education.

The Abigail Free Kindergarten.

A few weeks ago, an article descriptive of the work of the Abigail Free School and Kindergarten, in New York, appeared in these columns. Since that publication, the institution has removed to new and more commodious quarters at No. 104 Sullivan street. All the departments are well attended, the Kindergarten being situated in the centre of a densely populated section, where there are large numbers of children of the class whom it is intended to benefit. Material encouragement in this philanthropic work will be welcomed by the management of the institution. Mr. C. P. Devare is Superintendent. In addition to the moral and educational work now being conducted, there is a free dispensary connected with the Kindergarten. Dr. E. F. Hofman, the physician in attendance, has volunteered his services among the sick children, while the Kindergarten managers supply any needed medicines.

Jesus Crucified.

Sunday School Lesson for June 14th. Luke 23: 33-46. Golden Text, I. Cor. 15: 3. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

SELF interest blinds human nature to all sense of right and justice. The presence of the Son of Man upon earth was a continual test to those who came in contact with him. Speaking or silent, he was among men. One standing among them whom they knew not, and whom they could not understand. He was unlike themselves, all he did and said made them uncomfortable, for it struck at the root of all which was life to human nature. The flesh could not glory in his presence, there was nothing in Jesus which responded to the flesh which seeks its own glory, for he was ever seeking that of him that sent him. The self pleasing of the flesh ever had its rebuke in the presence of him who "pleased not himself."

In vain did the rulers of the people seek for a just accusation against Jesus; all the testimony of his life was that "he went about doing good and healing all them that were oppressed of the devil, for God was with him." The devils had borne witness that he was the Son of God, his works, and especially the raising of Lazarus and the healing of the man which was born blind, bore the same testimony. His teaching was but the carrying out of the Old Testament Scriptures. All this was clear enough for such as had eyes to see, and yet the rulers and the chief priests had a deadly and malignant Hatred Against Jesus.

Why was this? If Jesus were the true Messiah then they were proved to be false. Rulers, (whose office it was to rule men in the fear of God, if Jesus were acknowledged, lineal descendant of David that he was, and if he did come to sit on the throne of his father David, must lose their office; he could never rule with those whose life and spirit were so contrary to his own. The chief priests, whose office it was to bring men near to God, found the bitterest antagonism in their hearts against this man who did bring men near to God. If they acknowledged him, their position was at an end, they must renounce their office. For this they were quite unprepared. In the depth of their hearts, they worshipped another than the true God, they proved by their treatment of Jesus that self was their idol, their real god.

Justice lent no hand to the condemnation of Jesus; the heathen Pilate, again and again, enquired in vain, "What evil hath he done?" The miserable subterfuge of "false witnesses" failed, and "the rulers of the people and the chief priests" — to forget their duty, that, seeing their accomplices in the vulgar mob, they accomplished, by tumult, that condemnation of the Son of the Man which they could obtain no other way. And thus sinful men condemned him to death. It is easy to condemn these men in our hearts and to say, "If we had been in the days of our fathers, we would not have conspired with them to take the life of the prophets." But, alas! we, like the Jews of old, are witnesses to ourselves that we are their children, and that we inherit the same nature which is "enmity against God," "which is not subject to the law of God, neither can be," which "cannot please God" (Rom 8: 78), for which there is no remedy, and with which God can do nothing but bring it to the cross. Not only in our unconverted days, but even as converted people, whenever we have exalted ourselves, justified ourselves, depended upon ourselves, expected anything from ourselves, indulged ourselves, we have condemned Jesus who is come into the world, and into our lives, to carry our nature to the cross, to live his life, instead of ours, within ours, just as the Father dwelling in him did the works (John 14:10).

All that was written of Jesus must be accomplished; and among other Scriptures they know not what they do." This was not human nature; it was "God manifest in the flesh." Such fruit grows on no human stock, but where the flesh is denied and nailed to the cross, there Christ in us can bring forth such fruit, as we see in the martyrdom of Stephen. The life of the flesh which seeks its own, is death to the true spirit of Christ, the Lamb led to the slaughter, which openeth not her mouth, which doth not resist evil. The spirit of Christ cannot retaliate, which seeketh not her own (I. Cor. 13: 5) is death to the flesh, to fallen human nature. "And the people stood beholding." O how many there are who stand thus, who are would-be spectators, neither for nor against the Christ of God. And yet it is for these that the Son of God suffered these things.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

LUKE'S narrative of the Crucifixion is a simple, unadorned account, told as if it were ordinary history, yet with each pathetic incident sympathetically recorded. A short passage of fourteen verses suffices for this, the most stupendous event of all time. Yet his picture is vivid, taking in all the accessories — the spectators could respond to a prayer of faith. The thief was looking forward to a distant time when Jesus would reign. It was a remarkable exhibition of faith, for to appearance, all possibility of his reigning was at an end. But the thief must have heard something of the kingdom of God at this time and, though it had not altered his life, it had induced a faith which bore him to the last. It is not of that distant time that Christ speaks when he answers, but as he speaks now to believers the assurance of immediate blessing. The third sentence is a note of triumph. The darkness and horror that had clouded his whole life had returned. One peculiarity of Luke's description is the petition of the taunt of the rulers, soldiers and the impenitent thief. Times Christ was reminded of his prayer, "Save thyself!" That was what he did not do. Satan had made the same suggestion at the beginning of his ministry, he had come to lay down his life, though he could save others, for he could do nothing. It was his to suffer, not to avoid suffering. The constraint laid upon himself he retained to the end he could bear, in the greatness of his soul, to have his voluntary submission wrongly counted as weakness.

Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit. These were the last words of Polydore Jerome, Luther and Huss, who, as they came to the verge of the dark river, uttered them in the spirit of their Master. In the case of Huss there were circumstances which must have reminded him of Christ's last agony. When he was led out to execution, Constance in the year 1415, the priests and the officers of the civil power were in attendance and they joined in their taunts and execrations. A high gallows was placed on the margin of the river, and he was chained to the iron stake. The hat was covered with rude pictures of demons and Huss was told that they were the demons waiting to take possession of his soul. The brave man made no reply but as the flames kindled around him he was heard to cry with an unflinching voice, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit."

He saved others; let him save himself. The words were at the Crucifixion, yet we know how easily Christ could have saved himself if he had chosen. But he chose to die for those that others might live for. An illustration known to every school boy is that of the pilot of the river-boat who stood at the helm while his boat burned, holding it so as to keep the flames from the bank where everyone on board got ashore. He might have saved himself, but if he had deserted his post the passengers must have perished, and he stood firm at the cost of his own life.

Father forgive them; for they know not what they do. From this it would appear that even sins committed in ignorance need forgiveness. After Tillotson's death a page of cowardly, brutal libels was found among his papers. They were endorsed, "These charges are all false. I pray God to forgive the authors as I do."

To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise. An old divine says, "One instance of a man being saved in his last hour is given in the New Testament, so that none despair; and only one, so that none presume." A man was lying very ill, and death was near. He had neglected his soul all his life, and was afraid to die. A clergyman was by his side trying to explain to him the way of salvation. The dying man's senses were dull and he groaned with the pain. "I cannot think I cannot understand," he cried; "I shall be lost." The clergyman saw that his efforts were useless. "I can do no more," he said, "but Jesus can save you if you call upon him." "What, even now?" asked the dying man. "Yes, even now." The dying man in piteous accents entreated Christ to save a poor lost soul. There was a change in a few minutes. The man grew calm. What passed in his mind no one knew, but a light shone in his face and he died in peace.

THE HILL ON THE NORTH OF JERUSALEM BELIEVED TO BE CALVARY

Isa. 53: 12, "And he was numbered with the transgressors." That human nature, even at its best, cannot follow Jesus thus far, has been proved by the patient Job. The tremendous shock of the utter loss of all he possessed, combined with the heavy bereavement of his entire family in a single day was not sufficient to move this man of God from his steadfast reliance on his God. And even the greatest physical suffering in addition, such as in many cases has overcome some of the very truest children of God, found Job steadfast still. But when his friends began to number him among the transgressors, even Job broke down: human nature could go no farther, his patience failed him, and bitter retaliation and irony escaped his lips which up to this point had glorified God in all.

But Jesus, who was in all things made like unto his brethren (Heb. 2: 17) even to the living by faith in his Father's indwelling, as Christ dwells in our hearts by faith (Eph. 3: 17), accepted this wrong, and delighted to do his Father's will, and so fulfil the Scriptures. Then when they crucified him, and with him two malefactors, as though to imply that he who knew no sin was the fellow of such, he utterly ignored the base personal insult, and only turned to his Father with the prayer of deepest love and consideration for his enemies, "Father, forgive them, for looking on, the rulers deriding the Sufferer, the soldiers wrangling over their shares of his clothes, the brigands, one on each side of him, the title Pilate had written in mockery and had placed above his head, and finally the three hours of darkness at noonday, accompanied by the significant tearing of the thick veil, or curtain, which hid the Holy of Holies from the gaze of the people. From Luke's story we learn, too, of three utterances not recorded by the other Evangelists, which Jesus spoke during his last hours. These are: the prayer for the soldiers, the assurance to the repentant thief, and that last sublime sentence, in which, that sorrowful moment of conscious separation from his Father having passed, he commends his spirit in loving confidence into his keeping. The first of these was probably spoken at the beginning of the execution, when having nailed him to the cross, they raised it from its prostrate position and set it upright in the hole dug for it. This would be a moment of intense physical agony for the Saviour, and he interceded for the brutal soldiers, as though he feared that God would strike them dead. They are wonderful words, if we take into account what Jesus was suffering when he uttered them. The grandeur and magnanimity they express are simply marvelous. The second utterance to the thief at his side, shows how, even in the agony he was enduring, Jesus

Or 20,000 Lives Declared to be Sacrificed through it in Africa every Year—The Liberator's League and its Field of Effort.

AN AFRICAN FETISH HOUSE.

THE illusion that the hoisting of a European flag over immense stretches of the African map, or the establishing of a few military or missionary posts in the heart of African savagery, are followed by a magical disappearance of slavery and the traffic in human beings on which the institution is based. This illusion is fostered by the false patriotism of colonial authorities and writers who are afraid that their political rivals would use the facts against them, if it were known that illegal practices are the ruin of the territories over which their national flag is waving. Like every other truth, this illusion is baneful in its effect; and it is the duty of the anti-slavery societies to correctly inform public opinion by the publication of facts. Of all European nations, Great Britain is unquestionably the one which has the best record for determined action against the slave-trade and slavery itself. Yet there is no doubt that these evils are still flourishing in her African dependencies, except a few South-African colonies largely settled, and entirely governed, by white settlers. Even in Zanzibar the establishment of the British Protectorate has not been followed by the abolition of slavery. In a recent editorial, the London Christian says:

"The continued presence of slavery in Zanzibar is a stain on the escutcheon of England. The Sultan of Zanzibar is nominally under our protection, but is really a vassal, and if we put our foot down would be forced to abolish slavery. It is stated that by adopting that course in this dependency we are doing much to perpetuate the 'open sore' of Africa, and cause the sacrifice of over a score of lives every year to supply the Protectorate with slaves, besides causing untold misery in Zanzibar itself. England has been associated the world over with the great anti-slavery movement; and yet, for reasons hard to fathom, she here perpetuates the traffic in human bodies. It is a disgrace to our name, and steps should be at once taken to put an end to it."

France is, of all European nations, the one which makes the greatest boast of the "rights of man," and shows the greatest enthusiasm for universal liberty, fraternity and equality. Yet in all her African colonies, south of the Sahara, the most flagrant negation of these rights and principles—slavery—is to this day an all-pervading institution.

Writing from Kita, in the French Soudan, a thousand miles from the coast, in the midst of a highland of Alpine beauty, where two great feeders of the Atlantic, the Senegal and the Niger, have their sources, a well-known missionary writes, in substance, as follows: "Yes, slavery exists in spite of all regulations. It is, indeed, possible to gradually establish very expensive posts at a few strategic points; to intercept a few slave-caravans which pass near these posts; to prevent slave-raids in the immediate neighborhood; to stop the hoisting of public slave-marts wherever military detachments can enforce the execution of the white man's regulations; but it is impossible, as yet, to prevent slave-caravans from circulating secretly between posts several hundred miles apart; slave-holders from bartering their slaves; parents from selling their children; polygamous husbands from buying and selling wives; native courts from condemning criminals to slavery; the strong from kidnapping the weak. This result could only be obtained by placing a European soldier alongside of every native—and even the European would have to be inoculated against the virus of money-making at all cost. Nothing short of the complete regeneration of native African society by Christian, religious and civilizing agencies, will effect the extinction of African slavery. The weakness of government action, unless supplemented by religious transformation of the native, who considers slavery a natural social condition, is best shown by the following example. A French officer sees two slaves, a young man and a boy, cruelly treated by their master in a caravan. He liberates them and lets them go free. As soon as they are by themselves, the young man overpowers the boy and tells him, 'You are my slave; carry my bamboo.' And the boy patiently submits to what he considers the natural law of society. Near every French post, there is a village composed of freed slaves, to whom the liberating authorities have given land to cultivate. Now, these freedmen are as inveterate slave-dealers as their former owners. Their willingness to help the government officers in catching slave-caravans is due to their desire to secure some of the slaves for their own service, as domestic slaves. Wherever the posts try to enforce the complete suppression of slavery most of the natives move out of their reach. To suppress and prevent public exhibitions of cruelty and slave-raiding wars is about all the military posts can, at first, be expected to do. In Wasulu, slaves are so numerous that they have very little commercial value, and as a consequence, all the cruel instincts of savage mankind can there have full scope and unchecked career amid this human cattle. The most frightful atrocities are there committed daily and in public without exciting the least comment. Nearly all the devastating wars of Samory—himself a former slave—were prompted by his desire to secure more slaves wherewith to increase his supply of European fire-arms, ammunition and merchandise, or to replenish his harem and those of his officers. In Mohammedan regions, any avowed and energetic attempt to hastily eradicate slavery would cause instant rebellion.

At the French post of Kita, the slave-trade was merely controlled by the authorities. The regular price of young people above ten years averaged between thirty and forty dollars.

Necessary and helpful as European legislation against African slavery is, it will become effective only in as much as it is supplemented by Christian schools and a systematic teaching, by example as well as by precept, of the sinfulness of slaveholding and of the respectability of farm-labor, for free men as well as for women or purchased bondmen.

All those who will compare the plan of work of the Philafrican Liberator's League as expounded in "The Open Sore of the World" with the problems to be solved will agree with an editorial in the New York Sun of April 14, 1896, which says: "It is believed by many who have carefully examined Mr. Chatelain's plans, based as they are on his long study of African problems in the field where they must be solved, that a more practical scheme for the elevation of the native was never devised."

Heli Chatelain has made the task of aiding, enfranchising and enlightening the enslaved native African the great mission of his life. As the founder of the Liberator's League, he will be able, with its powerful organization, to do much toward carrying out its beneficent programme. All who are interested in the work may become actively identified with it by addressing Mr. Chatelain, at Room 511, United Charities Building, New York City. Pamphlets containing full information, with instructions for joining the League, will be freely sent on demand.

A Sainly Life Ended.

ONE afternoon about two weeks ago, there was a very large and representative gathering of God's people in the First Presbyterian Church, Rochester, N. Y., to pay the last tribute of love and respect to a dear departed friend. The occasion was the funeral of Mrs. Millard, the wife of the Rev. Dr. Nelson Millard of that city. In the assemblage, many Christian churches and denominations were represented, and the eloquent addresses delivered manifested a very high appreciation of the noble character and useful life that had just closed.

Alice Isabel Boyd (Mrs. Millard) was the sister of Mrs. Sarah I. Bird, whose evangelistic labors among the "lost boys" of the Bowery are already well known to a majority of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S readers. Mrs. Millard was for many years a prominent factor in every scheme of Christian work in Rochester—beautiful, honored, and beloved by the whole city. Among the refined and cultured she was a leader, both spiritually and intellectually, and among the poor she was regarded as a very angel of love and goodness. She had among the humble hundreds of beneficiaries, who will greatly miss the gentle heart and generous hand that so often cheered and helped them. Her nature was one that kept constantly in view the high Christian duty of helpfulness to others, and she found a pure and deep pleasure in good works, bestowing on others time, strength, money, counsel, cheer, with a noble self-forgetfulness that made such service the more precious. Certain traits of her character cannot be better described than in these words, by an intimate friend of the deceased, and who lived in the same city:

"Her convictions as to right and duty were firm, and while she had the courage to express them, she never offended, for she spoke all in love. Earth was not 'forced on her soul's use while seeing heaven'; she loved earth and the beautiful things of earth, and this was another source of her wide helpfulness, she was so human. . . . The faintest effort of the humblest person to lift his purpose was detected and heralded by her clear and sympathetic eye. She was a teller of good tidings; nothing delighted her more than to relate a piece of what might be called heavenly gossip about the thoughtful deed, or the bright word of some one else. She was fond of telling of a friend 'who had religion enough to keep house with, and to go 'way through to the kitchen,' little realizing that the expression exactly described herself."

"One of the best lessons of her full, rich life has been given all unconsciously to her, during her last months of suffering. To visit her (she had no 'sick-room') was to stand within a glory-place. If one went to offer sympathy or cheer, she came away herself enriched. To no one did she seem ill, because that bright, keen, luminous mind, that strong, loving, wholesome soul still radiated the life which endures forever more."

THE NEW MODERATOR.

THE General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church which is held this year at Saratoga, N. Y., has placed the highest office in its gift in the hands of

REV. JOHN L. WITHROW, D.D.

Rev. John L. Withrow, D.D., pastor of the Third Church of Chicago. By a vote of 315 the Assembly elected him Moderator on its first ballot. The election gives general satisfaction, for Dr. Withrow had the support of the Liberals in the Assembly, while his conservatism is so thoroughly known and recognized as to secure the confidence of the Conservatives. He is essentially a working pastor, with a profound conviction that the spirit and teaching of Christ are the greatest needs of our time, and that the Gospel is now as in every age the true remedy for the world's ills. In Philadelphia, in Indianapolis, in Boston, and now in Chicago, Dr. Withrow has carried on an aggressive work, standing for sound doctrine and for the practical application of it to daily life. During the eight years he has been in Chicago over sixteen hundred persons have been added to the church and though it contains few wealthy persons it has raised over three hundred thousand dollars. The church with its six Christian Endeavor Societies, its associations and clubs for the benefit of the people around it, is a centre of Christian helpfulness that is of inestimable value. Dr. Withrow's election to the Moderator's chair may therefore be taken as an evidence that the Assembly is looking rather to aggressive work in the world than to a continuance of the internal warfare which of late years has occupied its attention. His first utterance since his election confirms this opinion. It was a plea for peace in the church. The spirit of love, he said, had always proved itself more potent than the spirit of violence. Controversy hindered the progress of the church, as it always must.

An Imperial Poet.

Like the German Emperor, the ruler of Japan is something of poet. At the recent celebration at Court of the Japanese New Year a few weeks ago, the Emperor presented a poem (to be read at the fete), which was entitled "Congratulations." One verse read:

*Ame no shita
Nigito yo koso Iwashikore;
Yama no oku made
Mitsi no harukete.*

[Happy the age when
The country prospers; for then Does truth reach the remoteness
Of remote mountains.]

The Empress also had composed a poem, a verse of which ran thus:

*The rays of the sun
Of heaven reach to the dark
Mountain recesses.
Auspicious age! Each in His sphere happily prospers.*

Both poems were enthusiastically received.

A sepia-toned photograph of two men on horseback in a desert landscape. The man on the left is wearing a wide-brimmed hat and a light-colored shirt, holding a rifle. The man on the right is wearing a similar hat and a darker shirt, also holding a rifle. They are standing in a flat, arid area with a hazy background.

A vintage photograph of two men in formal attire. The man on the left is tall, wearing a top hat, a dark suit, and a long overcoat, with his right arm extended. The man on the right is much shorter, also in a top hat and suit, holding a cane and looking up at the taller man.

"I do not know," writes Bishop Tucker from Africa to Word and Work, "that anything cheered me more on my way to the Nile to Mengo than to have pointed out to me church after church crowning this or that hill, on the right hand and the left. There are now, I believe, more than two hundred of these churches scattered throughout the country. The decency and orderly way in which the services are conducted (as far as I have seen them) are conducive to another token of the great advance that is being made in spiritual things."

Tom Elder, and a Word to Mothers.

THERE goes Tom Elder down the street in his new carriage, with his new team, and isn't the whole equipage superb? Who is the little old lady with the round face and the merry eyes, sitting on Tom's side? Surely it isn't, but yes, to believe it is, no less a person than Tom's mother.

"If you please, we will drop Tom Elder from our vocabulary now, and use a more respectful form of speech, Cousin Letitia. Since Tom became a great lawyer, and now that he is retained as their counsel by the City Railroad Company, we must say Mr. Elder. You have been away fifteen years, dear; a great many things can take place in that space of time."

"Well, so it would seem. I left Tom keeping out Squire Winslow's office and running errands for any one who would employ him. He was a big boy then, fifteen years old, and strong and willing, but did not know that he was ambitious. And as I remember things, his mother was very poor and hard-working, and sold apples and pies."

"All that you remember is true. But there was much which you did not know. Tom was studying very hard even then, during every spare moment, and sitting up late at night. His opportunity came unexpectedly, as God's happenings do, and this was the way of it:

"Squire Winslow's eyes gave out, from overwork, suddenly and alarmingly. The doctor ordered entire rest, and several days in a darkened room. Of course the Squire could not get along without knowing what was going on. He hunted the newspapers read to him, and books, and legal reports, and by degrees the family were tired out, so constant were the draughts on their time and patience. One afternoon, Miss Sophy, who is Tom's Sunday School teacher, proposed to her father that Tom should dictate as reader a portion of each day, and the Squire agreed, finding Tom a very satisfactory substitute for his own eyes. It is not everybody who can read so clearly and intelligently that the listener is not troubled by the reader's personality, and accepts the medium of interpretation, with all pleasure. This was Tom's good fortune, and it was the first step on the ladder by which he climbed.

"He was promoted to an easier and more responsible place as general assistant, when the Squire was again, so to speak, sown man, and it goes without saying, that he studied evenings, and attended a law school which met at night, and never neglected an occasion when he could be of service to others, as well as with diligence and faithfulness occupying every post as was given him.

"So the years went on, and to-day Mr. Elder is on the top wave of success."

"What about his mother?" said Miss Letitia. "It was a hard pull for her, to educate her boy, on the profits of her little ke-shop; it must have been by the exercise of great self-denial that she succeeded, for her success meant his, and his, hers."

"She may have had trials," was the answer, "but she never talked about them, to-day she has her reward. Not a day in the land is more honored than Mrs. Elder, and she presides over her son's elegant home with grace and dignity. It is a pleasant sight to watch her face in the street, when Tom makes one of his eloquent speeches; there is no one there who longs on his words with so much eager sympathy, and you should see her eyes sparkle, and her face glow when he scores a point. What do you think she said the other day, when someone congratulated her on her brilliant son; just this: 'Tom is a good man, my dear. I knew he would be, for he was always a good boy.'"

I wonder whether mothers generally place the right estimate in their own minds on a good boy. This is a true story, as most of the sketches in this column are, and it is borne in on me that I ought to emphasize this point with the mothers who read. Mothers, do not suffer your sons to drift away from you, in sympathy, in effort, in aspiration for the truest and best. Do not be willing, for the sake of present ease, to let your young sons form associations of which you are ignorant, or play in the streets after nightfall, perhaps with the vicious, certainly with those who are not well cared for in Christian homes.

REV. C. C. McCABE, D.D.

A boy is not injured in the grain by a little privation. Sacrifice and self-denial do not hurt him, if he keep the fibre of his nature clean and pure. What injures a boy is any yielding to temptation, any tampering with falsehood and dallying with intemperance. The boy who works hard with a purpose in view, who reveres his mother and obeys her, and who grows in manliness, is reasonably sure to gain the respect of the community, and to do well in life.

Mothers, try to bring your boys early into the kingdom. Never rest while one of them is out of the fold. Christ-loving, Christ-led, Christ-serving, Christ-paid, should be the aim and the hope and the motto of every Christian mother for the son who is dearer to her than life.

"I go into the kitchen, and the cook fires me out; I go into the nursery, and nurse chases me away; I go into the parlor, and my mother says, 'Run away Jack!' I don't know where they want me, and I'll go into the street!" said a lad I knew. Was it not sad? Mothers, keep your boys your own. MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

In a Japanese Sunday School.

Dr. Dalton, quoted in the Zeitschrift für Missionskunde, describes the rapid growth of the Sunday School in Japan, and its great value in diffusing the Gospel. He describes a session, opening with hymns, sung to our Anglo-Saxon tunes. In one Sunday School Dr. Dalton was especially struck with two female helpers: one a young girl in somewhat inferior attire, somewhat distorted in form, but her features reflecting unmistakably her devoted care for the childish group entrusted to her, and her warm affection for the Word of Life, which she was setting forth; and it was plain to see by the attentively listening children that she understood how to touch the spot in the children's heart "where her word of the holy Friend of the children finds good lodgment." Yonder ten or twelve children around an old mother, by years, toils and cares bowed sheer to the earth, and the little ones clustered around her as around a grandmother who is disclosing to her grandchildren a strange and wondrous story-world.

The New Methodist Bishops.

The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church Elects Drs. McCabe, Cranston, and Hartzell to the Bishopric.

OUR readers will be glad to have the portraits, which appear on this page, of the two ministers whom the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church has elected to the bishopric. They are Rev. C. C. McCabe, D.D., and Rev. Earl Cranston, D.D. Their election does not increase the number of bishops, as they take the places of Bishops Bowman and Foster, who, on the recommendation of the Committee on the Episcopacy, were placed on the retired list as "non-effective." The report of the committee advising the retirement of the two venerable bishops was received with general regret. The two men are highly respected and they have both rendered valuable services to the church during the twenty-five years that they have held the office. There was a very pathetic scene when Bishop Foster's tall form with its crown of white hair, rose on the platform of the Conference, and, with Bishop Bowman, in a voice broken with agitation, asked permission to retire while the report was discussed. The sympathy of all present went with them, and there was a general wish that they could have been spared the pain that the report of the committee caused them. The Conference, however, realized that the committee had the interests of the church in view in reaching its decision, and endorsed it by its vote. The two bishops were accordingly retired, and they were commended to the Book Concern, which is authorized to make generous provision for their support. At a later session the same decision was reached as to the apostolic missionary-bishop, William Taylor, whose work in California, South America, India, Australia, and latterly in Africa, has won for him the respect of the whole religious world. He, too, on account of advanced age and increasing infirmities, was placed on the retired list.

The election of successors to Bishop Bowman and Foster was a matter of some difficulty. The rules of the Conference require that two-thirds of the voters shall be necessary to an election. A proposition was made to allow a majority to elect, but the Conference decided that in view of the importance of the office and of the urgent necessity of having the right men elected, it was unwise to relax the rule. The balloting continued through four days and not until the fifteenth ballot was an election secured. On that ballot 344 votes, eight more than were necessary to elect, were cast for Dr. C. C. McCabe, and on the sixteenth ballot Dr. Earl Cranston received 366 votes, and both ministers were consequently declared elected.

Dr. C. C. McCabe, better known as "Chaplain" McCabe, owing to his distinguished services in the war and his sufferings and ministrations in Libby Prison during his captivity of four months, has been for the past twelve years Secretary of the Missionary Society of the Methodist Church. He is in his sixtieth year and is a native of Athens, O. He was appointed by the Ohio Conference and was stationed at Putnam, when the war broke out. In 1863 he went to the front as Chaplain of the 122d regiment of Ohio Volunteer Infantry. He was captured on the battlefield of Winchester while ministering to the wounded and dying, and was sent to Libby Prison. After his release, his health was so broken that he was sent into the hospital where he slowly recovered. After the war, he returned to the regular ministry and was appointed to Portsmouth, O. Subsequently he was called into the service of the Ohio Wesleyan University. His great work, however, was done in connection with the Church Extension Society, which secured his services in 1868. He traveled through the whole Union pleading its cause and succeeded beyond the most sanguine expectation in raising funds and promoting the building of new churches. Sixteen years he gave to this arduous labor, throwing himself into the work with a devotion and an energy almost unparalleled. His services in that field commended him to the Board of Missions, which in 1884 secured him as Secretary. He entered on his new work with the same vigor, and during the twelve years he has held the office he has succeeded in so stimulating the giving spirit of the Church that the income has risen from $735,000 to $1,242,000.

It is a curious coincidence that Dr. Earl Cranston, who was elected to the bishopric on the same day as Dr. McCabe, was also born at Athens, O. He is in his fifty-sixth year, and has been thirty years in the ministry. He was converted in early boyhood, and commenced his studies in Ohio University with a view to the ministry. He had taken his Bachelor of Arts degree when President Lincoln's call for volunteers stirred his heart and turned his career in a different direction. He enlisted in the Third Ohio Infantry, and rose during the following years step by step to a Captaincy. After the war he was accepted by the Ohio Conference, and had several charges, until 1870, when, at his own request, he was transferred to Minnesota. He subsequently labored at Evansville, Ill., Cincinnati, O., and Denver, Colo., and became Presiding Elder of the Southern District of the Colorado Conference. To his energy and persistent labors while on that field are mainly due the initiation and development of Denver University, which before he left it, was practically clear of debt. In 1884 he was appointed by the General Conference to the agency of the Western Book Concern, in which he has since labored with success.

On May 25 the Conference elected a successor to Bishop William Taylor. It was thought by the colored members that the opportunity would have been used to elect a colored minister to the bishopric especially as the Committee on Episcopacy had expressed the opinion that the time was ripe for such an appointment. The first ballot, however, showed that there was no prospect of such a result. Two colored ministers, Rev. M. C. B. Mason of the Freedmen's Aid Society and Rev. H. A. Monroe both received votes but nearly the half of the Conference voted for Dr. Hartzell, the Senior Secretary of the Freedmen's Aid Society. On the second ballot Dr. Hartzell was elected by a vote of 335 out of 451. Dr. Hartzell is a native of Illinois and is fifty-three years old. He was educated at Garrett Biblical Institute at Evanston. He was associate corresponding secretary of the Freedmen's Aid Society for twelve years and had been elected by this Conference to the post of Senior Secretary. One of the first to grasp Dr. Hartzell's hand in congratulation after his election was Bishop Taylor who greeted his successor with a cordiality that showed the greatness and magnanimity of the man.

Is the Sultan Repentant?

FROM Constantinople there has come by cable a dispatch to The New York Herald, capable of two constructions. It states, substantially, that a "movement has been started, with the consent, and even at the desire, of the Sultan himself," looking to the reconciliation of the Armenians with Turkey. This nineteenth century Nero, in less than eighteen months, has given up to the sword and the torch, the plunderer and the ravisher, hundreds of Armenian towns and villages. He is said to have personally ordered the great massacres of Sassoun, Erzeroum, Trebizond, Cesarea, Baiburt, Arabkir, and Oorfa, and to appease his fanaticism nearly 100,000 helpless Christian men, women, and children, have been butchered, with an accompaniment of unparalleled horrors. This monster is now represented as regretting the "state of affairs in Anatolia," and as offering the right hand of friendship to the Armenians and expressing a desire for a reconciliation. Those survivors of the massacres, sitting naked and shivering beside their starving children, among the embers of their ruined homes, are asked to forgive and to forget the past. They are invited to grasp the hand now tendered to them by the desecrator of all they held dear, the man who has even deprived Armenia of its name, and made its sons and daughters a people without a country.

"To err is human, to forgive divine," and there has been so much that is noble and generous in the Armenian attitude, amid all these calamities, and so little of the spirit of revenge, that it would not astonish the civilized world to see the remnant of that outraged people accepting, in all trustfulness and hope, the proffered hand. Throughout their national history they have had abundant opportunities to exercise the cardinal Christian virtue of forgiveness toward their enemies, and we believe that, as the Master forgave his murderers, they themselves now freely extend the same Christ-like charity to their ancient persecutors, the Moslems, and to the Sultan himself. Such an act would be a sublime sacrifice of personal feeling, characteristic of a race that has given so many martyrs to the cause of truth.

But while, in such a situation, there would be no doubt as to the genuineness of Armenia's forgiveness, the sincerity of the Sultan's repentance might well be in question. There are three kinds of repentance, viz: that which arises from a sincere regret for sin, and a desire to do better; that which is suggested or inspired by selfish considerations, and that which is prompted by craven fear. To which of these three does the repentance of Abdul Hamid belong? Has he realized the enormities of his crimes against humanity and Christianity? Does he shudder with remorse when he contemplates the frightful butcheries of which he was the author? Is it diplomacy, rather than regret, that dictates the proffer of the hand of reconciliation—the desire to hoodwink Europe again for some ulterior, sinister purpose? Or, is it the dread of encountering a fate like that of the lesser tyrant, Nasr-ed-deen, that impels the overture of peace? Is this new promise to be believed when, as all the world knows, his very latest pledge to appoint a Christian kaimakam in Zeitoun, was broken by the appointment of a Mussulman after his own heart? Is he only planning another betrayal of Armenia?

There is still another kind of repentance, but it is of so extraordinary a character, that it is only once referred to in the sacred chronicle of the Gospel. It is the repentance of Judas, the betrayer, who, after he had accomplished the blackest infamy of all the ages, was stricken with remorse, and threw away his useless life on the field of Aceldama. Let us hope and pray that the repentance of Abdul Hamid be not insincere, but that, even at this late hour, he may have a touch of human pity awakened in his breast toward the poor Armenians.

Science and Religion.

THERE is no war between genuine science and religion. The same God who by the hand of prophet and evangelist wrote on parchment, by the hand of storm and glacier wrote on the rocks. But there is a science "falsely so-called" that disputes with God the government of the universe, and makes the Creator a superfluity, since all things were made by a fortuitous concourse of atoms; it throws away the archangel's trumpet which wakes the dead, and there is to be no resurrection. Yea, it proposes to build a bridge over into the next life, and men start on it with their long trains of immortal hopes, and they think the bridge is beautiful, and the bridge is strong—never such girders and never such arches—but midway the Lord blows upon it and they are destroyed without remedy.

Let human invention and science do their best—span widest rivers, scale highest heights, fathom deepest depths, start longest rail-trains in swiftest velocity; but let them be reverential before that God before whom Isaac Newton, and Kepler, and Professor Silliman, and Joseph Henry, and Louis Agassiz were not ashamed to bow. Herschel staggered back from his telescope exhausted and overwhelmed, unable any longer to look at the display of God's omnipotence. In every observatory, in every scientific school, in every museum, in every architect's studio, let there be an altar of worship as well as philosophic apparatus.

Conflicts Now, Crowns Later.

OUR business is to conquer the world. This is a greater task than most of us realize, and involves a wider view of life than we ordinarily take. We are not merely to kill sin in our own hearts but are to make the entire world better in its social, political, intellectual and religious life. Every department of human activity is to be infused with the sweet spirit of Jesus Christ. Then take your place in the battle. Be cheered by the fact that the faithful soldier of the cross will never lose his reward. As the traveler stands in the old Grevfriars' Churchyard at Stirling, Scotland, he may look up to the castle that towers above him like a huge sentinel of Scotland's rights. On the esplanade stands an imposing statue of Robert Bruce. He is clad in full armor and is looking out over the valley that was once the scene of the battle of Bannockburn. In the old burying-ground beneath the castle there is a more modest monument, known as "The Martyrs' Monument," erected to the memory of those who laid down their lives for the testimony of Jesus. It is a simple brown-stone shaft, and might be easily passed by. On each of its four sides are carved four plain figures. The lowest is a Bible with its pages opened wide. The second is a star. The next is a cross. Topmost of all is a crown. How striking the symbolism! The Word points to Jesus, "the bright and morning star." To follow him means to carry a cross. Carrying a cross is guarantee of a crown. Thus the Word points upward to Jesus, through him to the cross, and through the cross to the crown.

Since I must fight if I would reign,
Increase my courage, Lord.
I'll bear the toil, endure the pain,
Supported by thy Word.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

J. W., Leal, N. D. A good brother here very often in his prayer uses the following words: "Hasten the day, Oh Lord, when all shall know thee, whom to know aright is life eternal." Will you kindly say where the brother gets the above quotation?

It is undoubtedly suggested by the language of John 17: 3 and similar passages.

Reader, Kearney, N. J. Could you not sometime when you have space, talk of the difficulties of liberating slaves and the objects of the Philanthropic Liberator's League?

For all information concerning the League, write to Heli Chatelain at room 511, United Charities Building, New York.

A. K., Hallstead, Pa. Is it right to carry milk to the creamery on Sundays?

If it be a work of absolute necessity only, then it is right; if otherwise, then it is a desecration of the Lord's day. One's own conscience alone can decide in such matters. Sunday labor is never justifiable, except the duty be one of necessity or mercy.

I. E., Elkhorn, Wis. Do you think we could get some of the Armenians for help, if we would send money for their passage? To whom could we write? I have thought of Dr. Kimball, as she would know the ones suited to certain work. We have read nearly all that has been in your paper concerning the Armenians and their dreadful suffering, and I would like to aid in their relief even more. We are glad to get Christian help, and will give them a good home and Christian privileges. Do you know how much the fare would be?

This is one of several similar letters received concerning the Armenians. There is a likelihood that many of them will come to the United States soon. Meanwhile, any reader of this journal desiring to aid any Armenians by employment or otherwise, should communicate with the Armenian National Relief Association, New York City, which has special facilities for dealing with such cases.

Mr. Joseph Ruppia, Laird, Mich., writes: In THE CHRISTIAN HERALD I noticed Rev. G. J. Miller's letter, where he said that the smallest church was at Juana, and that it is 16x20. Now, I had the honor to be present at the dedication of a church at Laird, Houghton County, Mich., which just measures 15x20. Indeed, it is a very small church, but as they have tower and even bell in it, it looks very nice. There are three benches on each side, each of which holds three persons. Then they have a pulpit in one corner, a place for a choir in another, and an altar in the center. The builders of the church are a few very poor Finland farmers who hold to the Lutheran doctrine in which they have been brought up.

Anna M. Blessing, Philadelphia, Pa. Was Herod a king? I have been told that he was not a king. The Bible says he was.

There were ten members of the house of Herod, the first of whom, Herod the Great, (referred to in Matt. 2: 16-18,) was king of Judea, having obtained the title from Rome. It was a vassal kingship. His son, Herod Antipas, inherited the kingdom and was also tetrarch (or governor) of Galilee and Perea. This is the Herod who figures so conspicuously in the narrative of the Evangelists and before whom our Lord was sent by Pilate for examination, when Pilate learned that Jesus was a Galilean.

Subscriber, Blenheim, Ont., Can. Did Christ ever call any but his followers, brethren, or did he apply the term to all mankind? 2. To what extent should Christians associate with ungodly people, and what should be their actions toward such?

Christ himself supplied the answer to this question in Matt. 12: 50. See also Col. 1: 2, 1 Cor. 15: 6, and Mark 3: 33-35. There can be no spiritual relationship between light and darkness, between sin and holiness; consequently the appellation in its strictly spiritual sense, could not belong to all mankind indiscriminately. See also Matt. 23: 8. Employed in the merely human and social sense, the term is applied by the Saviour and his disciples alike to all men with whom we may have friendly or sympathetic relations. See Luke 22: 32, Acts 7: 26, 11 Cor. 11: 26, 1 Peter 5: 9, 2. Believers should not associate with unbelievers to the extent of participating in any of their wicked enterprises or actions, and they should be careful not to place themselves in an attitude that can be construed as consenting to or approving of ungodliness. It is required, however, nor is it practicable, that believers should seclude themselves, as by doing so they would sacrifice all opportunities influencing those who stand most in need of godly example and Christian advice. The missionary idea which should inspire every Christian life. Nothing can be accomplished, if the believer withdraw from the field instead of working for its reclamation. The Saviour himself was repeatedly accused of associating with publicans and sinners; his followers need not be ashamed to follow his example, provided they can truthfully say that they have been about "their Father's business."

"Subscriber," Lancaster, Pa. In Matt. 10: 1 Christ is represented as saying that he can produce strife and discord. Is that a correct account of what he said?

The words are a prediction, not a statement of the object of his coming. He did not come for that purpose, but it was the inevitable result. The persecution which ensued, the separation and alienation of members of the same family were actual facts due to the opposition and hatred aroused by confessing him.

J. M. Lawton, Cleveland, O. Who was the author of the lines we sing in most Christian Churches as the doxology, viz: "Praise God from whom all blessings flow?"

They form the concluding verse of a "morning hymn," written nearly 200 years ago by Bishop Thomas Ken of England. The verse is considered a masterpiece of comprehensiveness and compression, and is doubtless more widely by Christian people than any other verse in any language.

T. A. K., Marshfield, Oreg. Do the references Ezek. 13: 18 refer to the fashions of the period?

The references are to the heathen practices into which the people had fallen when false prophets were consulted, much as fortune-tellers are now. The sewing of "pills to all arm-holes" typifies the assurances the women gave to those who consulted them: paid them, of peace and security in spite of their sins. "Kerchiefs on the head of evastature," probably refers to the magic v thrown over the head, as the mediums require darkness for the performance of their feats. "Every stature" indicates people all ages.

Reader, Salt Lake City, Utah. 1. Will God answer prayers for friends who have died unconvinced? 2. Is baptism essential to salvation?

1. There is no ground for hope that the Bible contains nowhere any encouragement for the thought that the condition those who die impenitent can be changed. 2. Baptism is a command, and no Christ will voluntarily withhold obedience. It is conceivable that a man might be placed in circumstances where baptism could not be administered, and you cannot suppose that in such case God would exclude him on that account. Baptism is a duty, but if it cannot be performed, God does not require the impossible. Whosoever believeth shall not perish. (John 3: 16.)

"Faithful Subscriber." Do you think that the promises of answers to prayer apply to all prayers offered in faith?

No, there are some prayers which God love refuses to answer. If we could have whatever we think necessary for us, simply praying for it, we should wreck our own lives. As a wise father does not give his child everything he asks for, so God exercises his discretion about answering our prayers, even when they are offered in faith. Paul mentions prayer that he thrice offered, and it was not granted (11 Cor. 12: 8). God sees what best for us, though he wishes us to make our wants known to him. Christ mentions a condition of soul (John 15: 7) in which the prayers offered are answered, but it is a condition of submission. It is right for you to offer prayer you mention, but it should be in submission to God's better knowledge. We know of a case in which precisely that prayer was urged persistently for a long time and was ultimately granted, and has resulted in lifelong regret.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Hungary's Thousand Years.

HIS is a festival year in Hungary and the whole summer is to be marked by a series of celebrations commemorative of the founding of the nation. It is a thousand years since the chieftains of the Magyar tribes, having entered the fertile lands surrounded by the Carpathian Mountains, which they were to overrun and subjugate, took Arpad the son of Almos, and set him on their shields, made him the chief of the united nation. They came from the East, Asia seeking their new home and they early realized that only in union could they hope to wrest it from its Slavonic and Moravian possessors. Arpad bravely conquered the whole region we now know as Hungary, and it is the millennial anniversary of this settlement, conquest and organization that the Hungarians will celebrate this year. The celebration will begin on May 2, by the opening of a large exposition in the city of Buda-Pesth. It consists of one hundred and sixty buildings covering an area of nearly two million square feet. Into these are gathered exhibits representing the progress of the nation in agriculture, manufacture, science, art, music and commerce. One of the principal exhibits on an island is a group of historical buildings, the models of ancient castles still existing in various parts of Hungary, the best example of each style of architecture. Into these are gathered relics of the times they represent, ancient arms and armor, primitive agricultural implements, and the rude tools in use in bygone centuries. Another interesting feature is a Hungarian village divided into sections, each of which represents the type of farmhouse and peasant's cottage of some district of the country. During the continuance of the exhibition which is to main open till the end of October these village sections are to be occupied by peasants from the districts represented. In the center is a real church, where services will be held, and in which, so long as the exhibition is open, youths and maidens may be married free of all expense. The Emperor of Austria, who is King of Hungary, opened the exhibition in person and presided at the dedication of the monument to Prince Arpad, his first predecessor. Next year there is to be a political celebration, when the new Houses of Parliament, which have cost the nation over eight million dollars, are to be formally opened, at the millennial session of the Parliament, the first held in any land, will take place. The crown, sceptre, and other regalia of royalty which were the insignia of the first king of Hungary are to be carried in state to Francis Joseph at his royal palace. Other features of the celebration at the opening, in various parts of the kingdom, of five hundred new schools, and in September the inauguration of the great ship-canal, at the Iron Gates of the Danube, which will then be declared open to the traffic of the world. Thus does the nation celebrate its millennial year. Having recently celebrated our own centennial, we can understand the enthusiasm of the Hungarians on attaining the thousandth year of their national existence. They are justly proud of the distinction, but to them, as to us, the still higher distinction is conferred of belonging to a kingdom that has been from everlasting and of which there shall be no end—a kingdom the subjects of which cry, as they bend before their King in adoration:

A thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday when it is passed, and as a watch in the night. Ps. 90: 4.

An Explosive Gem.

A surgeon in New York was called a few days ago to a patient who had been injured in a peculiar manner. The man was bleeding from a jagged wound in his chin, which, he said, had been caused by the explosion of a diamond in his scarf-pin. The surgeon was incredulous, but when he dressed the wound, he found several minute fragments of the diamond imbedded in the flesh. The patient said that a few weeks previously he had purchased the diamond from a friend who had just returned from the diamond mines in the Transvaal, bringing with him a number of fine stones, which had been cut and polished in London. Among them was this gem, which attracted his notice through a peculiar mark in it. It was like an infinitesimal globule of water, in the centre of the stone. He bought the diamond from shape of falling plaster and cracking walls. The front wall fell outward into the street, and the floorings and ceilings and roof fell in with a crash. The fire department was soon on the scene and rescued several persons who were imprisoned by the fallen timbers without being hurt. Nine persons, however, were so badly injured that they were sent to the hospital and it is feared that some of them will die. Two dead bodies were taken out. One of the workmen said that the disaster was entirely due to carelessness. The pillars in the basement that supported the wall had been removed and only one slender support was left. This rested on the sidewalk, which collapsed under the weight. If that is true, a very grave responsibility rests on the contractors. They should have known that, substantial as the building was, it was not safe when the pillars were removed. That fact applies to character, too, though it is often forgotten by men who, in educating their children are careful to impart refinement and polish, but are heedless as to the religious faith which is the true foundation of character.

When the wall is fallen, shall it not be said unto you, Where is the daubing wherewith ye daubed it? Ezek. 13: 12.

An Escape from Waterspouts.

A thrilling story of peril at sea is told by the officers and crew of the Edith Sheraton, a barkentine which is now unloading her cargo at her Brooklyn pier. She was on her voyage from Macoris in San Domingo on May 17, with a cargo of sugar, and was from the crew. But at that moment the Captain threw the wheel over with all his force. The vessel's head turned westward as the waterspout continued its easterly course. Another turn of the wheel brought the vessel back with its head to the north just in time to avoid the fourth waterspout bearing down upon her. The crew gave a shout of joy and turned to see the procession of monster dangers pass harmlessly astern of their ship. They are loud in their praises of the Captain's skill and coolness, which saved them from apparently certain destruction. So in the voyage of life has the Christian often had reason to praise his Divine Captain to whom he has committed the guidance of his life. Time and again he has gone safe and rejoicing on his way, after a period of peril in his domestic or business life, during which, in the language of the Psalmist, he cried in his distress:

Deep calleth unto deep at the noise of the waterspouts. (Psalm 42: 7.)

BRIEF NOTES.

Mr. Henry Varley is Again Laboring in Australia. He has been holding Sunday services in the Hawthorn Baptist Church, Melbourne, and has begun a series of Sunday afternoon lectures on popular subjects.

The Remarkable Fact is Disclosed by the analysis of the latest census in England that the Wesleyan Church has decreased in numbers during the past year, a fact probably unprecedented in the history of Methodism. The decrease in full membership is 1,000, and in total membership 1,500. The view of the large increase of population this reduction is a fact it is difficult to understand.

Evangelists Thompson and Gamble have been conducting successful revival meetings at various places in South Dakota. At Centerville all the churches united in the meetings and there were large audiences and many conversions.

All Local Christian Endeavor Unions intending to compete for the banners to be awarded at Washington, are requested to report their work to Secretary Baer by June 15. One of the things goes to the union that has done the best work in Christian citizenship, in organizing the largest number of new societies since the Boston convention and in promoting proportionate giving.

The Death of Rev. J. Halsey Moore, D.D., Secretary of the Baptist Home Mission Society, has caused sorrow in many homes. Dr. Moore's pastorate in New York and his ready helpfulness to churches in many States won him wide popularity. He was only fifty-two years of age and was doing energetic and valuable work for the society he served. He had been its Secretary seven years.

The Report of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions shows that the total receipts for the year amounted to $879,749. These included from the churches, $272,009; the Woman's Boards, $392,697; Sunday Schools, $30,222; Young People's Societies, $26,694; legacies, $146,828; interest, individuals and miscellaneous, $101,390. The income leaves a balance over the year's expenditure of $30,535, to be applied to the reduction of the debt carried over from the previous year which was $174,770.

Dr. Charles A. Berry, who is Well-Known in this country and whose sermons at Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, were widely published, has been elected Chairman of the Congregational Union of England and Wales.

The Jubilee Meeting of the Evangelical Alliance, founded in 1846, will be inaugurated by a great meeting on June 29 of delegates from all lands. Over four hundred are expected to meet the English branch. The meetings will be held in Exeter Hall London.

The Presbyterian Pastor at White Lake, S. D., recently celebrated his eighty-eighth birthday. His church and congregation refuse to listen to any of his hints that it is time he retired from the ministry, and at his birthday celebration sent a deputation to his home to wish him "many happy returns of the day."

Dr. Leach, a Medical Missionary, and his wife and son were brutally murdered in their dwelling-place at Sfax, near Tunis, on the night of May 6. The assassins are unknown, though four natives have been arrested. Revenge seems to have been the motive, as no valuables in the house were touched. As Dr. Leach was a most kindly man whose medical service to the Arabs was held by them in high esteem, his death is deeply deplored. He was only thirty-six years old. Dr. Leach was originally sent to the African field by the Amity Baptist Church of New York.

The American Institute of Sacred Literature has issued an extensive programme of Summer Schools. They include Chautauqua, N. Y., July 11 to August 20; Bay View, Mich., July 11 to August 8; Montague, Tenn., August 9-23; Winfield, Kans., June 16-27; Winona, Ind., August 12-23; Saratoga, N. Y., July 15 to August 12, and seven other points, a full list of which may be obtained from the offices of the Institute, Hyde Park, Chicago. Each school will be under the charge of an eminent theological scholar, and will deal with some special period of Biblical history with the books associated with it.

MODEL BUILDINGS IN THE MILLENNIAL FAIR AT BUDA-PESTH.

his friend and had it set in scarf-pin. He had worn it until that morning. As he was on Broadway sheltering from a thunderstorm, he was startled by a sharp report and a stinging sensation in his chin. He thought someone had thrown a fire-cracker at him. Finding that his chin was bleeding, he removed his collar and scarf, and as he did so, he noticed that his diamond had disappeared from its setting. A diamond expert, who was asked about it, said that he had heard of such explosions occurring before and he believed that they were due to the little globule in the stone, which, he thought, contained carbonic acid gas. However the explosion may be explained, there was no question that the costly gem was utterly lost and in a literal sense the warning was fulfilled:

Riches certainly make themselves wings; they fly away. Prov. 23: 5.

Collapse of a Building.

The death of two persons and the serious injury of a dozen others resulted from the collapse of a building in Buffalo, N.Y., on May 21. The building was used for offices and stores, and occupied a conspicuous position at the corner of two streets. The Western Union Company had two floors in it until recently, but they had moved out and the owners were remodelling the building to suit other tenants. A portion of the building had been vacated before the contractors went to work, but occupants of the other portion remained, and about fifty persons, including workmen, were on the premises at the time of the disaster. There was no warning in the off Cape Hatteras, when the Captain went below to work out his reckoning. He was busy over his chart when an urgent message came to him from the first mate, whom he had left in charge of the ship. The vessel was on her northward course, and before her and behind her the sky was clear, but in the west there were heavy black clouds. But what had alarmed the mate was that, from the clouds, there were a number of strings like giant fingers pointing to the sea. The sight terrified both men, for they knew well what it portended. Those great fingers were waterspouts, and any one of them striking the ship would sink her. There were eight of them, as the Captain counted them through his glass. Where they touched the water they seemed no thicker than a man's arm, but they spread out in the shape of a mushroom as they approached the cloud, and they were whirling with terrific speed. They were coming right across the ship's course, and in a few minutes the vessel would be among them. The Captain ordered the sails shortened in the hope of delaying the ship until the waterspouts had passed, but they were too near to be escaped in that way. He took the helm himself and prepared to dodge the dread monsters. The first and second had passed and the third was just ahead of the ship's bows. Its crown was black and heavy and the sound of the water being sucked up by its spiral motion was an awful roar. In another minute the ship would strike it, and those countless tons of water above would fall upon her. A cry of mingled terror and despair came

A Little Switzerland.

Herzegovina's Peasant Population—A Beautiful Country that Stands Still While the Rest of the World Moves.

If one were to choose, anywhere in Europe, a country whose climate and natural scenery most closely resembled those of Switzerland, there would be little hesitation in selecting Herzegovina.

This Austro-Hungarian province, which has a population of only about 250,000, scattered throughout its 217 miles of length, and 120 of width, is divided into a variety of mountain plateaus by the Dinaric Alps, the whole country being watered by the river Narenta, which flows through the mountain range toward the Adriatic. Along the sides of the valley through which the river flows, lies all the life of the province. Towns, villages, and highways all lie parallel to the Narenta's stream, and on either side the impression is given of a valley with a white mountain wall as a natural rampart. As in Switzerland, the climate is cold in winter and sometimes oppressively hot in summer. Through the mountain passes there sweeps at times a cyclonic wind, known as the bora, which overwhelms everything in its path. The snow-fall is usually light, and does not last, save on the loftiest peaks.

Herzegovina's population as far as the cities are concerned, is a composite, embracing besides the Slavonic race, Gypsies, Jews, and a few Mohammedans. The old Slavonic customs and methods of family life are widely preserved. Although the country was long under Moslem control, the majority never adopted Turkish ideas or customs. There is only one wife in the home and she rules absolutely in domestic affairs. Physically, there is no finer-looking race in Europe—the men tall, broad-shouldered and dark-complexioned, with a commanding cast of features; the women much fairer, usually comely, and with strong, graceful figures. They are a brave, courageous, patriotic people, rich in their heritage of folk-lore, folk-songs, and legends, which describe the romantic stories of old-time Herzegovinian heroes. Ancient tribal relations are still very largely preserved among them, and they are divided into clans, or nahias, each with its wai-wode, or military chief. The sturdy peasantry, trained to arduous tasks by a life spent among the hills, are noted for strength and endurance. Sheep-raising, fishing and agriculture are their principal employments.

Christianity, under the forms of the Greek Church, has a strong foothold in Herzegovina. Amid many vicissitudes, and in spite of fierce persecution, the faith has survived and flourished. A Protestant missionary work is conducted there by the British and Foreign Bible Society.

Children of Genius.

It is not every father and mother who can distinguish genius in their children, even when others may see it. A writer in The Christian Herald says: "I have seen a boy driven to the plow and workshop when their place is at college. But we never know of this until a lightning stroke dazzles our eyes, and we see in the opaque background our boy standing out in grand loneliness from all the rest; standing there with his eyes dancing, his brain on fire, the air around him filled with strange whisperings, a sense as of a thousand willing hands beckoning onward. But such lessons are necessary. We cannot blame a lad for feeling bitterly over the instructions that have been persistently placed in his path. Patience ceases to be a virtue when the monotony of a hopeless life with unappreciative parents is threatened.

The Witchery of Home.

Even the plainest home, where love

sonal influence. If a merchant has diamonds to sell he does not shut them up in a drawer, nor display them in a rough box. He does not say, "Nothing can add to the value of a diamond, and I will not condescend to any tricks to catch admiration or draw customers. If a man really wishes to buy he will come to me." Christian principles ought to be rendered so attractive by your personality that those who know you will associate goodness and graciousness. Neatness and good taste in dress, a careful avoidance of all rude and disagreeable habits, conformity to the customs of good society, these are by no means trifles to be ignored by those who claim to belong to the highest court of honor. You do not properly represent your sovereign unless you are not only a patriot but a gentleman.

A Too Common Fault.

There is, unfortunately, such a thing as being too outspoken. Indiscreet frankness may amount to brutality, and untimely censure, uttered heedless of other's feelings, has many times produced sore heartburnings. Yet it is a habit that is prevalent in many Christian homes. How often do we hear among adult members of the same family the most unsparing criticism and harsh exposure of faults which, though troublesome, would better by far be censured less openly. Were the direction, "Tell him his fault between him and thee alone," more observed at home, many a turbulent sea of family discord could be calmed down easily. Children, who are always too ready to express their opinion

Baby's Grave.

LAST fall I planted hyacinths
On baby's little grave—
Dear boy—whose life no tears or prayers
Or love itself could save.
O, sorrow—none can understand
But they who, too, have known
And kissed some baby's flaxen hand
A grave and grief to own.
O, deep was placed his form that day
Beneath the verdant sod;
But his sweet spirit fled away,
And he is safe with God.
The bulbs I planted, too, were placed
Deep in their earthly tomb,
In hope that spring would see them
With fair and fragrant bloom.
They waited long in dark and cold—
Those bulbs so dry and brown—
But, O, the spring-time came at last
My grave with bloom to crown.
And spring shall come again to me,
Tho' hope is still denied,
And in heaven's garden I shall see
My baby glorified.
O, let my heart be patient then,
For God will answer prayer,
And give my darling back again,
A thousand times more fair.

Teaching Self-Helpfulness.

AS soon as children are capable of understanding the value of useful labor, they should be taught the elements of some industry that may be useful in the after years. The German, English, and Austrian princes are usually taught some light and useful vocation, partly way of pastime, and partly also to let the habit of industry. A lady writes: "I am taking care that my girls, as well as my boys, shall be taught to do something, and should it ever be necessary for them to do work in their own households, or for self-support, they will be prepared for the condition of life in which they may be placed. How many of the daughters of business men, or even of well-to-do mechanics, are being thus prepared? In some instances there may seem a little probability that the daughter will need to need her own gowns, or the son to labor, while in others there is every likelihood that there will be a necessity for their or other like work either in their own homes of moderate means, or, possibly, for needed self-support. Many times we see that the sons of recently successful men are less capable of self-support than those whose long line of wealth reaches back to generations of the past.

A Land Without Animals.

Most people would, I doubt, think it strange to live in a country in which there were no domestic animals. Such a land is Japan. There are no cows—the Japanese neither drinks milk nor eats meat. There are but few horses and these are imported mainly for the use of foreigners. The freight cars in city streets are pulled by coolies, and the pleasure carriages are drawn by men. There are few dogs, and these are neither used as watch dogs, beasts of burden, nor in hunting, except by foreigners. There are sheep in Japan, and wool is not used in clothing, silk and cotton being the staple. There are no pigs—pork is an unknown article of diet, and lard is not used in cooking. There are no goats, or mules, or donkeys.

A Child's Horizon.

Spiritually, as well as physically, says an observant writer, a child is long-sighted. His sky lies low above him, bound by mother's roof. His world lies all about him,—so near, so safe, so dear. And he is so much time to learn! To him, time is infinite. If death were a thousand years beyond, it could not seem more distant. We err in straining the child's vision beyond things beyond its humble, low-lying world. We ask him to believe too much and too soon. Surely the child whom Jesus "set in the midst of them" was nothing more than a child.

A PEASANT PLOWING.

PEASANTS OF HERZEGOVINA ON THE ROAD TO THE TOWN MARKET.

dwells, has a romance and a witchery of its own. In life's battle one finds many enemies, and much abuse and slander and detraction; but into home, if it is what it ought to be, such things never find their way. There, to the wife, the plainest man becomes a wonderful being. And if father says a thing, it is so by revelation to his children. At home the memory of vanished charms clings to the wife, who, there at least, remains a fresh young beauty there, long after she is a plain, middle-aged woman everywhere else. There grandpa's stories are never found tedious, and grandma's gingerbread is always appreciated, and the gawky girls are all pleasant, and the boys all embryo heroes.

Graces of Manner.

Some very earnest young Christians, writes Emily Huntington Miller, make a mistake in putting too light a value upon those graces of manner and little courtesies of speech and conduct which might commend their excellent qualities to others, and give them the vantage ground of per-of others, feel keenly the shortcomings of their associates. Why need we give additional emphasis to these weaknesses by open censure, thus alienating one from the other, until the very loving titles of brother and sister are empty, only in so far as they designate the same parentage!

The Children of Drunkards.

A sad and startling disclosure has been made by a Parisian scientist, yet it is one that will hardly astonish either Christian or scientist, since both necessarily believe that the sins of the fathers may be and often are visited upon the children. Dr. Paul Garnier of Paris, who has been making a special study of the children of habitual drunkards, comes to this conclusion: "There is a flaw in the very nature of these young wretches that the psychologist sees clearly and notes with apprehension—the absence of affectionate emotion; and when they do not become lunatics they show insensibility and pitilessness." Here is a temperance lesson of unusual power for all to ponder.

What Think Ye of Christ?

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor Topic for the Week Beginning June 14. Matt. 16: 13-19.

MEN are classed by many tests, socially, politically, intellectually and morally, but there is no test so radical and searching as the one that this question applies. What does a man think of Christ? As he thinketh in his heart so he is. It is not a mere matter of opinion. It is impossible to be neutral in regard to him. His claims are such that they must be accepted or rejected, and non-acceptance means rejection. If a man were in prison for rebellion, and under sentence of death, and he was informed that by self-sacrifice, or intercession of one influential person, his pardon had been obtained, under certain conditions, there would be no difficulty in understanding his attitude if he neglected to inquire what the conditions were, and took no steps toward fulfilling them. If he expressed profound respect for the person who had gained pardon for him, thought highly of him, but did not avail himself of the pardon, nor in any way show his gratitude to his benefactor, his admiration for him would not count for much. It is with a man's attitude toward Christ. Indifference to him, neglect of him, implies hostility. If the work Christ counts for nothing in a man's life, if it does not influence his conduct, does not affect his thinking, speaking and acting, Christ's achievement of all that it cost was wasted, as far as he is concerned. What think ye of Christ? is a question, therefore, which becomes momentous in its issues, and the answer to it which every man makes, who knows anything about Christ, indicates his character.

Christ stands before the world in many aspects,—as a Saviour, as a Teacher, as a King, as a Mediator, as a Judge, as a Friend,—and in all is most important that we know of him rightly; but there is another aspect which should not be neglected. It is that to which a great writer gives the name of spiritual dynamic force. Christ came to give life and power. It is this that the world specially needed. What man thinks of Christ as the source of power, is a factor of immense importance in his life. Everyone knows that orthodoxy is not Christianity. A man may be absolutely orthodox, may have a mind like a pinet in which every doctrine is accurately defined, neatly shelved, and put in its proper pigeon-hole, and yet he may be far from being a Christian. There is a link missing between his knowledge and his conduct. He may go farther. He may have an admiration for the right and the good, and yet be unable to say as Paul describes, "The good that I would I do not; the evil that I would not, at I do." The link is still missing and it is this link that Christ supplies. He gives the power and the force that are needed. How it comes we know not, but we know how to get it. Things are possible to him that believe. The hand of faith stretched out to him grasps the power and a living connection is established which transforms the weak. Those who have drawn on this power are amazed at the results. In the fierce struggle with evil, when the strength is well spent the eye has turned to Christ in anxious appeal and power has come. What think you of Christ as a source of spiritual power? is a question which every Christian may answer from experience.

Nearer.

NEARER my rest with each succeeding day
 That bears me still mine own allotted task!
 Nearer my rest! the clouds roll swift away.
 And nought remains, O Lord, for me to ask.
 If I but bear unflinchingly life's pain.
 And humbly lay it at thy feet divine,
 Then shall I see each loss a hidden gain,
 And thy sweet mercy through the darkness shine.
 Nearer my rest! the long, long weary hours

Had well-nigh gained the victory o'er my soul:
 Thy mercy, falling soft like summer showers,
 Upheld me, fainting near the victor's goal.
 Patience—that I may never sink dismayed,
 However dark and drear may seem the road;
 Patience—through doubt, through every cross that's laid
 Upon my heart—nor sink beneath the load.
 Faith—that e'en though to mortal eyes be hidden
 The reason why this life be oft oppress'd,
 I only do, with childlike trust, as bidden,
 And leave to thee, confidently, the rest!

Russia in Prophecy.

Recent Events in Persia and Abyssinia Fulfilling Ancient Bible Prophecies.

RECENT events reported by cable recently, deserve the notice of the students of prophecy. These are first, the accession to the throne of Persia of Muzaffer-ed-Din, and second, the friendly relations established between Russia and Abyssinia. The former event has a special concern for European statesmen, because it changes the attitude of Persia toward the rivalry of England and Russia in Asia. So long as the late Shah lived, friendship subsisted between England and Persia, which the former was anxious to cultivate. Persia is the gate by which Russia might, in the event of hostilities, pour her legions into India. It was important to England, therefore, that the Shah of Persia, in his capacity of gate-keeper, should be loyal to British interests, and should be ready to interpose an obstacle, should Russia desire to use his kingdom as a highway to India. The late Shah displayed this loyalty, and England was grateful to her useful friend. The assassin's bullet has changed all this. The new Shah is Russia's devoted friend. As a prince, during his father's lifetime, he made concessions to Russia, in the provinces of which he was governor, and was sharply rebuked by his father for doing so. Now, however, he has a free hand which Russia will undoubtedly grasp with the eagerness of hope long deferred.

The second of these events is the remarkable friendliness displayed by Russia toward Abyssinia. In the recent conflict with Italy, Abyssinia was congratulated by the Czar on the success that attended her arms. Russia also sent a Red Cross detachment to assist in caring for the wounded, and offers of military assistance, the full extent of which were not disclosed, were made by the Czar to King Menelik. As the Italians had been defeated and practically driven out of the country, Abyssinia did not need military aid, but the King, in declining, expressed his gratitude for the friendly offer. The news of these approaches caused world-wide surprise. But there is no question as to the facts, whatever the motives of Russian statesmen may have been.

The significance of these two events to the student of prophecy consists in the predictions of the grouping of the great powers of the world in the titanic conflict which is to occur at the close of this dispensation. In his work on "Impending Judgments," published two years ago, Dr. Beverley O. Kinnear called attention to the peculiarities of this grouping. Referring (page 172) to Ezekiel's vision of the allied forces in the two hostile camps (Ezek. 38: 2-6), he pointed out the strangeness of the company of which Russia is to be the leader. Under the Russian banner the nations first mentioned are Persia and Ethiopia. Now, as King Menelik has most persistently insisted that his kingdom shall not be called Abyssinia, but Ethiopia, which he contends is its proper name, the significance of the prophecy is obvious. In 1893, there were no indications of the possibilities of any such alliance. There seemed then no national event more unlikely than that of Russia reaching out to Persia on the east, and Abyssinia on the west, with offers of friendship. Yet, this was what the prophet predicted, and this is what has come to pass.

A PRINCESS IN CALICO,

or The Nobility of Service

Written specially for THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

BY EDITH FERGUSON BLACK.

CHAPTER I.

HE stood at her bed-room window before going down stairs to take up the burden of a new day. She was just seventeen, but they didn't keep any account of anniversaries at Hickory Farm.

The sun had given her a loving glance as he lifted his bright, old face above the horizon, but her father was too busy and careworn to remember, and, since her mother had gone away, there was no one else. She had read of the birthdays of other girls, full of strange, sweet surprises, and tender thoughts—but those were girls with mothers. A smile like a stray beam of sunshine drifted over her troubled young face, at the thought of the second Mrs. Harding stopping for one instant in her round of ponderous toil to note the fact that one of her family had reached another milestone in life's journey. Certainly not on washing day, when every energy was absorbed in the elimination of impurity from her household linen, and life looked grotesque and hazy through clouds of soapy steam.

She heard her father now putting on the heavy pots of water, and then watched him cross the chip yard to the barn. How bent he looked and old. Did he ever repent of his step she wondered. Life couldn't be much to him any more than it was to her, and he had known her mother! Oh! why couldn't he have waited; she would soon have been old enough to keep house for him.

The minister had spoken yesterday of a nebulous heaven where people were presumably to find their height of enjoyment in an eternity of rest. She supposed that was the best of it. Old Mrs. Good-enough was always sighing for rest, and Deacon Croaker prayed every week to be set free from the trials and tribulations of this present evil world, and brought into everlasting peace. An endless passivity seemed a dreary outlook to her active soul, which was sighing to plume its cramped wings, and soar among the endless possibilities of earth, it seemed strange that there should be no wonders to explore in heaven. Well, death was sure anyway, and after all there was nothing in life—her life—but hard work, an ever-recurring round of the same thing. She thought she could have stood it better if there had been variety. Death was sure to come, sometime, but people lived to be eighty, and she was so very young! Still, perhaps monotony might prove as fatal as heart failure. She thought it would with her—she was so terribly tired. Ever since she could remember she had looked out of this same window as the sun rose, and wondered if something would happen to her as it did to other girls, but the days went past in the same dull routine. So many plates to wash, and the darning basket seemed to grow larger each year, and the babies were so heavy. She had seen somewhere that "all earnest, pure, unselfish men who lived their lives well helped to form the hero—God let none of them be wasted. A thousand unrecorded patriots helped to make Washington." It seemed to her Washington had the best of it.

"Help me get dressed, P'liney," demanded Lemuel, the youngest step-brother, from his trundle-bed. "You are loitering; why don't you hurry up?" "Well, be awful cross with you. She always is wash-days. Hi! you'll get it!" and he tried to respond himself from a hint by his braces.

"Come and get your face washed, Lemuel. Now, don't you be, you know you're got to say your prayers before you can go down."

"Can't be bothered," replied that worthy, as he squirmed into his jacket like an eel, and darted past her. "I'm as hungry as Robinson Crusoe, an' I'm goin' to tell Mar how you're loiterin'."

She followed him sadly. She had forgotten to say her own prayers.

"Fifteen minutes late," said Mrs. Harding severely as she entered the kitchen. "You'll hev to be extra spry to make up. There's pertaters to be fried, and the children's lunches to be put up, an' John Alexander's lost his jography. I believe that boy'd lose his head, if it twarn't glued to his shoulders. There's a button off Stephen's collar, an' Susan Ann wants her hair curled, an' Polly's frettin' to be taken up—it beats me how that child does fret. I believe I'll put her to sleep with you after this—I'm that beat out I can hardly stand. Here, Leander, go and call your father, or you'll be late for school again, an' your teacher'll be sending in more complaints. 'Bout all them teachers is good for anyway—settin' like ladies twiddling the leaves of a book, and thinkin' themselves sum pumpkins, because they know a few words of Latin, and can figure with an X. Algebray is all very fine in its way, but I guess plain arithmetic is good enough for most folks. It's all I was brought up on, and the multiplication table has kept me on a level with the majority."

Pauline smiled to herself, as she cut generous slices of squash pie to go with the doughnuts and bread and butter in the different dinner-pails. That was just what tired her, being on a level with the majority! The long morning wore itself away. Pauline toiled bravely over the endless array of pinafores which the youthful Hardings managed to make unrepresentable in a week.

"Monotony even in gingham," she murmured; for Polly's were all of pink check, Lemuel's blue, and Leander's a dull brown. "Saves sortin'," had been the brief response, when she had suggested varying the colors in order to cultivate the aesthetic instinct in the wearers.

"But Mrs. Harding," she remonstrated, "they say now that it is possible for even wall paper to lower the moral tone of a child, and lead to crime—"

Her stepmother turned on her a look of withering scorn.

"If your hifalutin' people mean to say that if I don't get papering to suit their notions, I will make my boys thieves and liars, then it's well for us the walls is covered with sensible green paint that'll wash. To-morrow is killing time, and next week we must try out the tallow. You can be as æsthetic as you're a mind to with the head-cheese and candles."

Pauline never attempted after that to elevate the moral tone of her step-brothers.

Her father came in at supper time with a letter. He handed it over to her as she sat beside him.

"It's from your Uncle Robert, my dear, in Boston. His folks think it's time they got to know their cousin."

"Well, I hope they're not coming trailin' down here with their city airs," said Mrs. Harding, shortly. "I've got enough people under my feet as it is."

"You needn't worry, mother; I don't think Sleepy Hollow would suit Robert's family—they're pretty lively, I take it, and up with the times. They'd find us small potatoes, not worth the hoeing." He sighed as he spoke. Did he remember how Recalled Stormy Times.

"Well, that was a stormy time," said the old soldier, looking at a group of children, and he told them of the days when he had fought the battles of the Revolution, and of the days when he had fought the battles of the Civil War. He told them of the days when he had fought the battles of the Revolution, and of the days when he had fought the battles of the Civil War. He told them of the days when he had fought the battles of the Revolution, and of the days when he had fought the battles of the Civil War.

Pauline's mother had drooped and died from this very dullness? Was he glad to have her child escape?

"Well, I don't see how there's any other way for them to get acquainted," retorted his wife. "Pawliney can't be spared to go traiping up to Boston. Her head's as full of nonsense now as an egg is of meat, an' she wouldn't know a broom from a clothes-wringer after she'd been philandering 'round a couple of months with people that are never satisfied unless they're peeking into something they can't understand."

"But I guess we'll have to spare Pawline," said Mr. Harding. "She's been a good girl, and she deserves a holiday." He patted Pauline's hand kindly.

"Oh, of course!" sniffed Mrs. Harding in high dudgeon, "some folks must always have what they cry for. I can be kep' awake nights with the baby, and work like a slave in the daytime, but that doesn't signify so long as Pawliney gets to her grand relations."

"Well, well, wife," said Mr. Harding, soothingly, "things won't be as bad as you think for. You can get Martha Spriggs to help with the chores, and the children will soon be older. Young folks must have a turn you know, and I shall write to Robert to-night and tell him Pawliney will be along shortly—that is, if you'd like to go, my dear?"

Pauline turned on him a face so radiant that he was satisfied, and the rest of the meal was taken in silence. Mrs. Harding knew when her husband made up his mind about a thing she could not change him, so she said no more, but Pauline felt she was very angry.

As for herself she seemed to walk on air. At last, after all these years something had happened! She stepped about the dim kitchen exultantly. Could this be the same girl who had found life intolerable only two hours before? Now the Aladdin wand of kindly fortune had opened before her dazzled eyes a mine of golden possibilities. At last she would have a chance to breathe and live. She arranged the heavy, common ware on the shelves with a strange sense of freedom. She would be done with dish-washing soon. She even found it in her heart to pity her step-mother, who was giving vent to her suppressed wrath in mighty strokes er pudding-stick through a large bowl of buckwheat batter. She was not going to rest. When the chores were done, she caught up the fretful Polly, and carried her upstairs saying the magic name over and over to herself. She even found it easy to be patient with Lemuel as he put her through her nightly torture before he fell into the arms of Morpheus. She did not mind much if Polly was wakeful—she knew she should never close her eyes all night. The soft spring air floated in through the open window, and she heard the birds twitter and the frogs peep; she heard Abraham Lincoln, the old horse that she used to ride to water before she grew old enough to work, whinny over his hay; or Goliath, the young giant that had come to take his place in the farm work, snort him sonorously; the dog barked as a night hawk swept by, and in the distant henyard she heard a rooster crow. Her pity grew, until it rested like a benison upon all her humble friends, for they must remain in Sleepy Hollow, and she was going away!

CHAPTER II.

Preparation for Departure.

suppose you'll be wanting some finery for your girl," said Mr. Harding, the next morning as he pushed away his chair from the breakfast table. "Dress is the first consideration, isn't it, with women?" "I don't know about the finery, father," said Pauline, laughing a little. "I expect I shall be satisfied with the essentials."

Harding crossed the room to an old-fashioned secretary which stood in one corner. Coming back he held out to her a dollar bill. "Will this answer?" "It is terrible tight just now, and the package falls due next week. It's hard on me keeping the wolf away these dull days."

Pauline forced her lips to frame a "Thank you" as she put the bank-note in her pocket, and then began silently to clear the table with her thoughts in a tumultuous way. Ten dollars! Her father's hired man received a dollar a day. She had been working hard for years, and had received nothing but the barest necessities in the way of clothing, purchased under Mrs. Harding's economical eye. When Martha Jones came to take her place she would get her regular wages. Were hired help the only ones whose labor was deemed worthy of reward? Dresses and hats, and gloves. Absolute essentials with vengeance, and ten dollars to cover the bill!

"You can have Abraham Lincoln and the spring wagon this afternoon, if you want to go to the village for your gewgaws."

"Very well, father." "I don't suppose you'll rest easy till you've made the dollars fly. That's the way with girls, eh? As long as they can get a lot of flimsy laces and ribbons and things they're as happy as birds. Well, you young folks must have their fling I suppose. I hope you'll enjoy your shopping, my dear," and Mr. Harding started for the barn, serene in the consciousness that he had made his daughter happy in the inability to purchase an unlimited supply of the unnecessary things which girls delight in.

"You're a grateful piece, I must say!" remarked her stepmother, as she administered some catnip tea to the whining Polly. "I haven't seen the color of a ten dollar bill in as many years, and you put it in your pocket as cool as a cucumber, and go about looking as glum as a herring. What's going to do the clothes I'd like to know? I can't lay this child out of my mind for a minute. I believe she's sickening for a fever, and then, perhaps, your moralizations won't be so anxious to see her coming. For my part, I wouldn't be in such a hurry to knuckle to people who would seventeen years to find whether I was in the land of the living before they said 'How d'ye do.' But, then, I always was proud spirited. I despise meachin'."

"I guess I can get most of the ironing done this morning, if you'll see to the dinner," said Pauline, as she put the irons on the stove and went into another room for the heavy basket of folded clothes. Dresses and boots and gloves. The words kept recurring to her inner consciousness with a persistent regularity. She wondered what girls felt like who could buy what they didn't need. She thought it must be like heaven, but not Deacon Creaker's kind, that looked less attractive than ever this morning.

As she passed Mrs. Harding's chair, Polly put up her hands to be taken, but her mother caught her back.

"No, no, Pawliney hasn't got any more use for plain folks, Polly. She's going to do herself proud shopping, so she can go to Boston and strut about like a frilled peacock. You'll have to be satisfied with your mother, Polly. Pawliney doesn't care anything about you now."

Pauline laughed bitterly to herself. "A frilled peacock, with a ten dollar outfit!"

She began the interminable pinafores. The sun swept up the horizon and laughed at her so broadly through the open window that her cheeks grew flushed and uncomfortable. Lemuel burst into the room in riotous distress with a bruised knee, the result of his attempt to imitate the Prodigal Son, which had ended in an ignominious head-over-ears tumble into the midst of his swinish friends. This caused a delay, for he had to be hurried out to the back stoop and divested of garments as odorous, if not as ragged, as those of his prototype. Then he must be immersed in a hot bath, his knee bound up, reclothed in a fresh suit and comforted with bread and molasses.

She toiled wearily on. The room grew almost unbearable as her stepmother made up the fire preparatory to cooking the noontide meal, and Polly wailed dismally from her cot. The youthful Prodigal appeared again in the doorway, his ready tears had made miniature deltas over his molasses begrimed countenance, his lower lip hung down in an impotent despair.

"What's the matter now, Lemuel?"

"I want my best shoes and a wing on my finger, an' the axe to kill the fatted calf."

Would the basket never be empty? Her head began to throb, and she felt as if her body were an ache personified. The mingled odors of corned beef and cabbage issued from one of the pots and permeated the freshly-ironed clothes. She drew a long, deep breath of disgust. At least in Boston she would be free from the horrors of "boiled dinner."

Her scanty wardrobe was finished at last, and she stood waiting for Abraham Lincoln and the spring wagon to carry her to the station. A strange tenderness toward her old environment came over her, as she stood on the threshold of the great unknown. She looked lovingly at the cows, lazily chewing their cud in the sunshine, she felt sorry for her stepmother, as she strove to woo slumber to Polly's wakeful eyes with the same lullaby which had done duty for the whole six; she even found it in her heart to kiss Lemuel, who, with his ready talent for the unusual, was busily cramming mud paste into the seams of the trunk which held her worldly all.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

CONSOLATION IN TROUBLE.

A Sermon Preached by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., at Washington, D. C., on the Text: Exodus 10: 13, "And the Lord brought an east wind upon the land all that day and all that night."

THE reference here is not to a cyclone but to the long-continued blowing of the wind from an unhealthy quarter. The north wind is bracing, the south wind is relaxing, but the east wind is irritating and full of threat. Eighteen times does the Bible speak against the east wind. Moses describes the thin ears blasted by the east wind. The Psalmist describes the breaking of the ships of Tarshish by the east wind. The locusts that plagued Egypt were borne in on the east wind. The gourd that sheltered Jonah was shattered by the east wind; and in all the six thousand summers, autumns, winters, springs, of the world's existence, the worst wind that ever blew is the east wind. Now, if God would only give us a climate of perpetual north-wester, how genial and kind and placid and industrious Christians we would all be! But it takes almighty grace to be what we ought to be under the east wind. Under the chilling and wet wing of the east wind the most of the world's villainies, frauds, outrages, suicides, and murders have been hatched out. I think if you should keep a meteorological history of the days of the year, and put right beside it the criminal record of the country, you would find that those were the best days for public morals which were under the north or west wind, and that those were the worst days for public morals which were under the east wind. The points of the compass have more to do with the world's morals and the Church's piety than you have yet suspected. Rev. Dr. Archibald Alexander, eminent for learning and for consecration, when asked by one of his students at Princeton whether he always had full assurance of faith, replied, "Yes, except when the wind blows from the east." Dr. Francia, Dictator of Paraguay, when the wind was from the east, made oppressive enactments for the people; but when the weather changed, repealed him of the cruelties, repealed the enactments, and was in good humor with all the world.

Before I overtake the main thought of my subject, I want to tell Christian people they ought to be observant of climatical changes. Be on your guard when the wind blows from the east. There are certain styles of temptations that you cannot endure under certain styles of weather. When the wind blows from the east, if you are of a nervous temperament, go not among exasperating people, try not to settle bad debts, do not try to settle old disputes, do not talk with a bigot on religion, do not go among those people who delight in saying irritating things, do not try to collect funds for a charitable institution, do not try to answer an insulting letter. If these things must be done, do them when the wind is from the north, or the south, or the west, but not when the wind is from the east.

You say that men and women ought not to be so sensitive and nervous. I admit it, but I am not talking about what the world ought to be; I am talking about what the world is. While there are persons whose disposition does not seem to be affected by changes in the atmosphere, nine out of ten are mightily played upon by such influences. O Christian man! under such circumstances do not write hard things against yourself, do not get worried about your fluctuating experience. You are to remember that the barometer in your soul is only answering the barometer of the weather. Instead of sitting down and being discouraged and saying, "I am not a Christian because I don't feel exhilarant," get up and look out of the window and see the weather vane pointing in the wrong quarter, and then say, "Get thee behind me, Satan, thou prince of the power of the air; get out of my house! get out of my heart, thou demon of darkness horsed on the east wind. Away!" However good and great you may be in the Christian life, your soul will never be independent of physical condition. I feel I am uttering a most practical, useful truth here, one that may give relief to a great many Christians who are worried and despondent at times.

Dr. Rush, a monarch in medicine, after curing hundreds of cases of mental depression, himself fell sick and lost his religious hope, and he would not believe his pastor when the pastor told him that his spiritual depression was only a consequence of physical depression. Andrew Fuller, Thomas Scott, William Cowper, Thomas Boston, David Brainerd, Philip Melancthon were mighty men for God, but all of them illustrations of the fact that a man's soul is not independent of his physical health. An eminent physician gave as his opinion that no man ever died a greatly triumphant death whose disease was below the diaphragm. Stackhouse, the learned Christian commentator, says he does not think Saul was insane when David played the harp before him, but it was a hypochondria coming from inflammation of the liver. Oh, how many good people have been mistaken in regard to their religious hope, not taking these things into consideration! The Dean of Carlisle, one of the best men that ever lived, and one of the most useful, sat down and wrote: "Though I have endeavored to discharge my duty as well as I could, yet sadness and melancholy of heart stick close by and increase upon me. I tell nobody, but I am very much sunk indeed, and I wish I could have the relief of weeping as I used to. My days are exceedingly dark and distressing. In a word, Almighty God seems to hide his face, and I intrust the secret hardly to any earthly being. I know not what will become of me. There is doubtless a good deal of bodily affliction mingled with this, but it is not all so. I bless God, however, that I never lose sight of the cross, and though I should die without seeing any personal interest in the Redeemer's merits, I hope that I shall be found at his feet. I will thank you for a word at your leisure. My door is bolted at the time I am writing this, for I am full of tears."

What was the matter with the Dean of Carlisle? Had he got to be a worse man? No. The physician said that the state of his pulse would not warrant his living a minute. Oh, if the east wind affects the spleen, and affects the lungs, and affects the liver, it will affect your immortal soul. Appealing to God for help, brace yourself against these withering blasts and destroying influences, lest that which the Psalmist said broke the ships of Tarshish, shipwreck you.

But notice in my text that the Lord controls the east wind: "The Lord brought the east wind." He brings it for especial purpose; it must sometimes blow from that quarter; the east wind is just as important as the north wind, or the south wind, or the west wind, but not so pleasant. Trial must come. The text does not say you will escape the cutting blast. Whoever did escape it? Especially who that accomplished anything for church or state ever escaped it? I was in the pulpit of John Wesley, in London, a pulpit where he stood one day and said: "I have been charged with all the crimes in the catalogue except one—that of drunkenness," and a woman arose in the audience and said: "John, you were drunk last night." So John Wesley passed under the flail. I saw in a foreign journal a report of one of George Whitefield's sermons—a sermon preached a hundred and twenty or thirty years ago. It seemed that the reporter stood to take the sermon, and his chief idea was to caricature it; and these are some of the reportorial interlinings of the sermon of George Whitefield. After calling him by a nickname indicative of a physical defect in the eye, it goes on to say: "Here the preacher clasps his chin on the pulpit cushion. Here he elevates his voice. Here he lowers his voice. Holds his arms extended. Bawls aloud. Stands trembling. Makes a frightful face. Turns up the whites of his eyes. Clasps his hands behind him. Clasps his arms around him, and hugs himself. Roars aloud. Hollas. Jumps. Cries. Changes from crying. Hollas and jumps again." Well, my brother, if that good man went through all that process, in your occupation, in your profession, in your store, in your shop, at the bar, in the sick-room, in the editorial chair, somewhere, you will have to go through a similar process; you cannot escape it.

Keats wrote his famous poem, and the hard criticism of the poem killed him—literally killed him. Tasso wrote his poem entitled "Jerusalem Delivered," and it had such a cold reception it turned him into a raving maniac. Stillingfleet was slain by his literary enemies. The frown of Henry VIII. slew Cardinal Wolsey. The Duke of Wellington refused to have the fence around his house, which had been destroyed by an excited mob, rebuilt, because he wanted the fence to remain as it was, a reminder of the mutability and uncertainty of the popular favor.

And you will have trial of some sort. You have had it already. Why need I prophesy? I might better mention an historical fact in your history. You are a merchant. What a time you had with that old business partner! How hard it was to get rid of him! Before you bought him out, or he ruined both of you, what magnitude of annoyance! Then after you had paid him down a certain sum of money to have him go out, and to promise he would not open a store of the same kind of business in your street, did he not open the very same kind of business as near to you as possible, and take all your customers as far as he could take them? And then, knowing all your frailties and weaknesses, after being in your business firm for so many years, is he not now spending his time in making a commentary on what you furnished as a text? You are a physician, and in your sickness, or in your absence, you get a neighboring doctor to take your place in the sick-room, and he ingratiate himself into the favor of that family, so that you forever lose their patronage. Or, you take a patient through the serious stages of a fever, and some of the impatient father or husband of the sick one rushes out and gets another medical practitioner, who comes in just in time to get the credit of the cure. Or, you are a lawyer, and you come in court with a trickster in your profession, and in your absence, and contrary to agreement, he moves a nonsuit or the dismissal of the case; or the judge on the bench, remembering an old political grudge, rules against you every time he gets a chance, and says with a snarl, "If I don't like my decision, take an exception." Or, you are a farmer, and the cure stings the fruit, or the weevil gets into the wheat, or the drought stunts the corn, the long-continued rains give you no opportunity for gathering the harvest. Your best cow gets the hollow-horn, your horse gets foundered. A French proverb said that trouble comes in on horses and goes away on foot. So trouble descended in on you suddenly, but oh, how it was in getting away! Came on he back, goes away on foot. Rapid in coming, slow in going. That is the history of nearly all your troubles. Again and again you have experienced the power of the east wind. It may be blowing from that direction now.

My friends, God intended these troubles and trials for some particular purpose. They do not come at random. Here is the promise: "He stayeth his rod from the day of the east wind." In the Tower of London the swords of the guns of other ages are burned and arranged into huge passion-flowers and sunflowers, and bridal cakes, and wonder how anything so hard as steel could be put into such floral shapes. I have to tell you that the hardest, sharpest, most cutting, most piercing sorrows of this life may be made to bloom in blossom and put on bridal festivity. The Bible says they shall be mitigated, they shall be assuaged, they shall be graduated. God is not going to allow you to be overthrown. A Christian woman, very much despondent, was holding her child in her arms, and the pastor, trying to console the woman in her spiritual depression, said, "There, you will let your child drop." "Oh, no," she said, "I couldn't let my child drop." He said, "You will let it drop." "Why," she said, "if I should drop the child here, it would dash his head out!" "Well, now," said the Christian minister, "don't you think God is as good as you are? Won't God, your Father, take as good care of you, his child, as you take care of your child? God won't let you drop."

I suppose God lets the east wind blow just hard enough to drive us into the harbor of God's protection. We all feel we manage our own affairs. We have brains and compass and chart and quadrant. Give us plenty of sea-room and we sail on; and sail on; but after awhile there comes a Caribbean whirlwind up the coast, and we are helpless in the gale, and we cry for harbor. All our calculations upset. Say with the poet,

Change and decay on all around I see,
O then who changes not, abide with me!

The south wind of mild providence may just throw off the cloak of Christian character and we catch cold, but the sharp wind of trouble makes us wrap around the warm promises. The best thing that ever happens to us is trouble. That is a hard thing perhaps to say; but I repeat for God announces it again and again, the best thing that happens to us is trouble.

When the French army went down into Egypt under Napoleon, an engineer, digging for a fortress, came across a tablet which has been called the Rosetta stone. There were inscriptions in three or four languages on that Rosetta stone. Scholars studying out the alphabet of hieroglyphics from that stone were enabled to read ancient inscriptions on monuments and tombstones. Well, many of the hard writings of God in our life are indecipherable hieroglyphics; we cannot understand until we take up the Rosetta stone divine inspiration, and the explanation comes out, and the mysteries all vanish, and what was before beyond our understanding now is plain in its meaning, as we read, "All things work together for good to them who love God." So we decipher the hieroglyphics. Oh, my friends! have you ever calculated what trouble did for David? It made him the sacred minstrel of all ages. What did trouble do for Joseph? Made him the keeper of the corns of Egypt. What did it do for Paul? Made him the great apostle to the Gentiles. What did it do for Samuel Rutherford? Made his invalidism more strenuous than robust health. What did it do for Richard Baxter? Gave him capacity to write of the "Saint's Everlasting Rest." What did it do for John Bunyan? Showed him the shining gates of the city. What has it done for you? Since the loss of that child your spirit has been purer. Since the loss of that property, you have found out that earthly investments are insecure. Since you lost your health, you have never before a rapt anticipation of eternal release. Trouble has humbled you, enlarged you, has multiplied your resources, has equipped you, has loosened your grasp on this world and tightened your grip on the next. Oh! bless God of the east wind. It has driven you into the harbor of God's sympathy.

Nothing like trouble to show us that this world is an insufficient portion. Hogarth was about done with life, and he wanted to paint the end of all things. He painted on canvas a shattered bottle; a cracked bell; an unstrung harp; a sign-board for a tavern called "The World's End" falling down; a shipwreck; the horses of Nebus lying dead in the clouds; the woman in her last quarter, and the world on the "One thing more," said Hogarth. "My picture is done." Then he added the broken palate of a painter. Then he added. But trouble, with hand mightier and more skilful than Hogarth's, pictures the falling, failing, mouldering, dying world. And we want something permanent to lay hold of, and we grasp with both hands after God, and say, "The Lord is my light, the Lord is my love, the Lord is my fortress, the Lord is my sacrifice, the Lord, the Lord is my God."

Bless God for your trials. Oh, my Christian friend! keep your spirits up by the power of Christ's Gospel. Do not surrender. Do you not know that when we give up, others will give up? You have courage, and others will have courage. The Romans went into the battle, and by some accident there was an inclination of the standard. The standard might meant forward march; the inclination of the standard meant surrender. Through the negligence of the man who carried the standard, and the inclination of the army surrendered. Oh! let us keep the standard up, whether it be blown down by the east wind, or the north wind, or the south wind. No inclination to surrender. Forward into the conflict.

There is near Bombay a tree that they call the "sorrowing tree," the peculiarity of which is it never puts forth any bloom in the daytime, but in the night puts out all its bloom and all its redolence. And I have told you that though Christian character puts forth its sweetest blossoms in the darkness of sickness, the darkness of bereavement, the darkness of death, "weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." Across the harsh discords of this world rolls the music of the skies—music that breaks from the lips, music that breaks from the harps and rustles from the palms, music like falling water over rocks, music like wandering winds among leaves, music like carolling birds among forests, music like ocean billows forming the Atlantic beach: "They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them nor the heat; for the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall lead them to living fountains of water, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." I see a great Christian fleet approaching that harbor. Some of the ships come in with sails rent and bulwarks knocked away, but still afloat. Nearer and nearer the shining shore. Nearer and nearer eternal anchorage. Haul away, my lads! haul away! Some of the ships had mighty tonnage, and others were shallops easily lifted of the wind and wave. Some were men-of-war and armed of the thunders of Christian battle, and others were unpretending tugs taking others through the "Narrows," and some were coasters that never ventured out into the deep seas of Christian experience; but they are all coming nearer the wharf—brigantine, galleon, line-of-battle ship, long-boat, pinnace, war-frigate—and as they come into the harbor I find that they are driven by the long, loud, terrific blast of the east wind. It is through much tribulation that you are to enter into the kingdom of God.

You have blessed God for the north wind, and blessed him for the south wind, and blessed him for the west wind; can you not in the light of this subject bless him for the east wind?

Nearer to thee,
Nearer to thee,
Even though it be a cross
That leads to thee,
Still nearer to thee,
Nearer, my God, to thee,
Nearer to thee.

Gospel Progress in Burma.

Rangoon is not only the headquarters of the British government in Burma, but of the Baptist mission work as well. Here are flourishing missions to the Burmans.

THE FAMOUS EADS BRIDGE AT ST. LOUIS and to the Sgaw Karens, and many schools and educational institutions connected with the missions. In Insein, a suburb, is found the Theological Seminary, in which native preachers are trained for Baptist mission work among all the numerous races of Burma. In the city, says the Missionary Magazine, we find the Rangoon Baptist College for the training of students of all races. In Kemendine, one of the pleasantest parts of the city, is the Baptist-Mission Girls' School, which has long done splendid work in education. In this city are also the headquarters of the Rangoon Sgaw Karen Mission, with its excellent town school and missionary agencies. There are also a school for Eurasian boys and girls, a school for the children of the Telugu and Tamil people, besides other smaller mission schools. Here is located the Baptist Mission Press, which employs about seventy-five persons and issues every year millions of pages of tracts, scriptures and literature in all the languages of Burma. This is the only place in which printing in several of the languages and dialects of Burma can be executed. In Rangoon civilization, semi-civilization and barbarism are strangely mingled, and its people are gathered from all nations and represent a great variety of races. Here rise the temples of Christian worship, and the shrines of heathenism, but Christianity is gaining the day. The religious condition of Rangoon at the present day compared with even a few years ago, shows a vast improvement. As the capital, so the country, and Rangoon is but an illustration of the progress which the religion of Jesus Christ and its accompanying Christian civilization is making over heathenism, with its cruel barbarities and senseless superstitions.

St. Louis Tornado-Swept.

The Most Destructive Storm Ever Known in the Southwest—Hundreds of Lives Lost and over $15,000,000 Damage to Property.

ELDORADO does it fall to the lot of the press to record a disaster so swift, so overwhelming and so complete as that which befel the city of St. Louis, Mo., and its surroundings on the evening of May 27th. For less than half an hour, the city rocked and reeled in the grasp of a tornado of immeasurable strength and destructiveness, and when it passed, the path of the storm was strewn with the wrecks of dismantled and shattered buildings, and hundreds of human beings lay dead or mangled amid the ruins.

There was but little premonition of the coming storm. The official record of the Weather Bureau said of the beginning of the tornado: A storm centre had moved slowly eastward during the day. By 3 P. M. the sky became thickly covered with clouds. By 3.30 these clouds had settled into a uniform mass, which commenced to assume a light green color in the northwest. The green colored cloud continued to advance from the northwest, spreading more toward the west and north, and at the same time the temperature commenced to fall. A violent secondary storm centre was created, as indicated by the continual falling of the barometer.

At 5:04 p. m. the storm broke forth in all its fury. The wind changed suddenly to northwest with rapidly increasing velocity. Rain fell in torrents; the green clouds still remained in the west and north, but the storm moved from northwest toward southwest, and large, angry-

Among the terror-stricken population there were few who had the courage to observe the course that had been followed by the tornado, but from points beyond its immediate path, its progress was clearly visible to onlookers. Some of those spectators say that the air was loaded with flying debris. In its course the tornado several times seemed to leap upward from the ground and then returned to earth to inflict still greater havoc. At a distance it bore a resemblance to a huge, inverted funnel shaped like a waterspout, and revolving upon its centre with frightful rapidity. From its vortex—which drew in everything it touched, like a maelstrom—there was flung high in the air such a miscellaneous collection of debris as can hardly be described.

Had this terrific aerial visitor prolonged its stay, the destruction to human life would have been appalling. As it was, the result was sufficiently fearful, for, during the few moments when the tornado was at its height—hours, as they seemed to the unfortunates who were in its path—many hundreds of lives were utterly crushed out. The streets of St. Louis and East St. Louis were strewn with dead bodies and shattered dwellings, while many lay dying under the ruins of structures that had collapsed, burying all within.

Among the structures injured by the cyclone was the famous Eads bridge across the Mississippi, which was so badly dismantled at one end, where the full force of the wind struck it, that it has been closed for traffic until repaired. The Merchant's bridge also suffered greatly. The "Four Courts," the New Union Depot, St. Vincent de Paul Insane Asylum, the Auditorium, Chamber of Commerce, Jail, Convention Hall, City Hospital, Scandinavian Church, and many others were more or less injured, some being almost completely wrecked. Hardly any part of the city wholly escaped, although the greatest damage was in a comparatively limited section. On the south side of the city, the dwellings were razed to the level ground, rich brownstone dwellings and humble frame cottages sharing the same fate. Factories, markets, warehouses, stores, electric power houses, club houses, hotels, schools, churches, breweries, trees, fences, tall chimneys were demolished and hurled through the air with the speed of an express train. Houses, barns, and wagons, the spectators declare, were whirled about as if propelled by a gun.

In St. Louis 187 bodies of recognized dead were found after the cyclone passed. There were also found 11 unknown dead, 20 fatally injured, and 800 less seriously injured, while over 60 were known to be missing. In East St. Louis there were 149 known dead, 5 unknown dead, 3 fatally injured, 350 less seriously, and about 20 missing. The total fatalities in the two cities will not fall short of 500. The loss to property in St. Louis alone is estimated at $15,000,000, while in East St. Louis, and among the river steamers, as well as in the outlying districts, the damage may reach two millions more. The loss on the river to steamer and other property is estimated at $500,000. Many points in Indiana, Missouri, Illinois, and Pennsylvania suffered simultaneously with St. Louis though in a less degree, and a number of lives were lost in country districts by the great storm of the 27th of May, which will long be remembered as the most destructive that has been known in the West in a generation.

The Risen Lord.

Sunday School Lesson for June 21st. Luke 24: 36-53. Golden Text, Luke, 24: 34. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

It was the foretaste of his glory when Jesus rose from the dead. Up to that moment, humiliation upon humiliation had marked the path of him who left the glory which he had with the Father "before the world was" (John 17: 5), to take upon him "the likeness of sinful flesh." (Rom. 8: 3.) He took upon him the form of a servant and was made in the likeness of men, and "being found in fashion as a man, he humbled himself, and became obedient unto death, even the death of the Cross." (Phil. 2: 7, 8.) This does not say all. Add to his temptation in the desert, his rejection by the chief of the people, his apparent failure, and the defection of his little company of disciples at the last, and still we cannot sound the depth of his humiliation. Only his Father knew the awful depth of those "lower parts of the earth" where he descended (Eph. 4: 9), when the sin and shame of all the human race lay on him. And this was which was from the beginning, by whom all things were made, and who still upholds "all things by the Word of his power." O let our hearts bow down and worship our crucified and risen Lord! Before his death upon the cross, the Scriptures were sealed to the disciples; they had been able to preach the coming kingdom, he had given them power to cast out devils and to heal the sick, but all this was possible while they yet had very little knowledge of the Holy Scriptures. The life of Jesus was a living out of the Word of God; he had said in his great high-priestly prayer: "I have given them thy Word;" "the words which thou gavest me I have given them;" and he speaks as though these words included all things that the Father had given him. And now, after his resurrection, he seeks, before all else, to lead his disciples to see what is the treasure which they have in the Word of God. In what sense did he give them the Word? Truly, in his own words to them, he quoted from the written word; but this was not all; himself was the fulfilling of the law, the accomplishment in his own Person, and in his own life, of all that was written. He had lived out the Word of his Father, and he alone is the power by which any of his people may live out the Scriptures. I have given them thy Word. In a deep sense, "God, having of old time spoken unto the father, in the prophets by divers portions and in divers manners, hath at the end of these days spoken unto us in his Son" (Heb. 1: 1, R. V.), in the Life which translated the Old Testament into a living thing, a breathing Life of "God manifest in the flesh." It was not Moses nor the Prophets, but he of whom they spake, and in whom the Father spake who could say with truth, "I have given them thy Word."

And yet, after having spoken it out to his Father in that prayer, how simply and unostentatiously did he open the Scriptures to his disciples! Two of them were on the way to Emmaus communing and questioning together over the great things concerning the Christ and the rumors of his resurrection. And he drew nigh. How one with another over his Word, he still draws nigh. Waiting until they had told him out all their hearts, he said, "O, foolish men, and slow of heart, to believe

And beginning from Moses and all the prophets, he interpreted to them in all the Scriptures the things concerning himself." After he had left them they said one to another, "Was not our heart burning within us, while he spake to us in the way, while he opened to us the Scriptures?" He was leaving behind him an inexhaustible treasure, but he must teach them how to make use of it. It was a new world which opened to them, and they hastened to tell "the eleven and them that were with them" (ver. 33), probably the hundred and twenty (Acts 1: 15), the things which had happened: Jesus risen, and

The Scriptures Opened.

As they spake with the eleven of him, and of his Word, he was again present,

"HE LED THEM OUT AS FAR AS TO BETHANY."

with his precious message of "Peace be unto you." But they who had not understood when he taught them about the cross could not understand the resurrection. The sense of terror which seized them on the lake of Galilee when they took Jesus coming on the sea to their assistance for a spirit, seized them now. Then "they were sore amazed in themselves; for they understood not concerning the leaves, for their heart was hardened" (Mark 6: 52); now their hearts were equally hardened about the sufferings and death of him whom they hoped should have redeemed Israel. But he said to them: "Why are ye troubled? and why do thoughts arise in your hearts? Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself. Handle me and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have." Pierced hands and pierced feet told the story of peace which they had not understood before; the light began to dawn, they knew now what Isaiah meant when he said, "The chastisement of our peace was upon him, and with his stripes we are healed." (Isa. 53: 5.) The old expectations of earthly glory began to give way, a new horizon opened before them, their long inactive and sleeping inner man began to awake, and God's Christ, crucified, and risen, and coming again in glory, stood revealed before them. Joy as intense as their fear and ing entered in without opening a door, now brings them down to ordinary life, and asks them if they have anything to eat! And when they brought him a piece of a broiled fish, he took it and ate it before them. Independent of the laws of matter and yet able to eat and drink as men do! We cannot understand such an existence. But when our Lord shall come again, those who wait for him and whose citizenship is in heaven, shall be like him, conformed to his body of glory, and that in the twinkling of an eye. Just as with the two disciples with whom he walked to Emmaus so with the eleven, the Lord's first concern was to lead them to the Scriptures. The writer of Ps. 119 has never been identified but he who speaks in this wonderful Psalm is undoubtedly the same who said, "I delight to do thy will, O my God, yea, thy law is within my heart." (Ps. 40: 8).

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

It is not extraordinary that one who has looked on the dead should find it difficult to believe in the resurrection. The disciples were slow to believe in the fact that Jesus had risen from the dead. They had not believed him when he told them of his approaching death, and they seem altogether to have failed to apprehend his meaning when he told them that he would rise again. They for all who accept the testimony of Evangelists in other matters. It is part of their narrative and must stand fall with it. And after all, it ought not require so much faith to accept it. resurrection and ascension form a fitting termination of such a life as they describe. That a Being who lived such a life as is portrayed in the Gospels, who did such mighty deeds as are there recorded, should arise from the dead and ascend into heaven should not be hard to believe. Indeed without such a close, the life would be complete. Paul was logical, when he declared that if Christ had not risen faith would have been vain. We could not have trusted in a dead Christ, who had himself been conquered by death. It was necessary that he should arise and ascend into heaven that his people might be sure that he was and is the Lord of life.

It behooved Christ to suffer and rise from the dead. An old fable describes a fox approaching a cave about which there were many footprints, showing that many foxes had been there before him. He was about to enter when he noticed that all the footprints were turned the same way. They had all been made by foxes going into the cave; there were none made by foxes coming out. The fox at once drew the conclusion that there was danger there, and turned aside and did not go in. Such a cave there is at the end of our lives. Human footsteps lead to death, but there were none returning. But Christ changed all that. They who tread in his footsteps will survive death and live because he lives.

Then opened he their understanding. Wonderful things are all around that we do not perceive without assistance. The beauty of the fly's wing, of the dust, the butterfly's body we would not see if we were not for the microscope. The grandeur and glory of the stars would be unknown without the aid of the telescope. The discovery of the Roentgen rays opens a new field of vision into the inner living organism. It is so in the spiritual world. The glory and beauty and profound truths of the Word of God are not discerned without the illumination Christ gives.

It is I myself. The disciples knew the Master was dead, and could not believe was come back to life. They thought they beheld a spirit. His strangely sudden appearances and disappearances showed that he was living in a world near them, though invisible to them, and that he had a spiritual body. What that body was we cannot understand, but the fact that the sepulchre was empty indicated that the natural body was the basis for which it was constructed by divine power. Dr. Halley uses as an illustration of the change the story of a silver cup. He says that a silversmith's servant dropped a silver cup into a pan of aquafortis. The cup disappeared in the strong acid, and the servant feared he would be charged with stealing it. Trembling with fear, he told his master and begged him to believe his story. The silversmith infused silver water which caused the acid to precipitate the metal it held in suspension. The silver was recovered and a cup was made of it.

Repentance and remission of sins. This was the boon Christ brought to the world. A Chinese Christian thus vividly contrasted this Gospel message with the religion his countrymen believed in. "A man has fallen into a deep pit and lay in the mire at the bottom helpless. Confucius passed by and looking down on him said: 'Pardon me, I am sorry for you; you are paying the penalty of heedless walking. If you get out you must be more careful in the future.' That," said the Chinaman, "is Confucianism. A Buddhist passed by and he looked on him and said: 'Try to scramble out; if you can get up half way I can reach you and help you.' But the poor man said, 'I cannot move.' That is Buddhism. Then Christ came by and he went down to the poor man and laid hold of him and carried him up. That is Christianity."

Power from on high. It is given still and is suitable for all classes. When John Wesley was at the height of his fame he heard that some profligate noblemen were coming out of curiosity to hear him preach. He took for his text, "O generation of vipers who hath warned you?" That sermon said one of his hearers afterward was more fit for the prisoners in Newgate than for us. Wesley replied: "No, if I have been preaching in Newgate my text would have been: 'Behold the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world.'" thought he was speaking in parable. Not one of them appears to have looked for any such event. The report of the women who went to the sepulchre and found it empty, and the confirmation of the report by Peter and John, were only confusing to their minds. Even the two disciples on the way to Emmaus, had no suspicion of the truth, under circumstances which might have been thought directly suggestive of it. One perceives how remote from their minds must have been any expectation of Christ rising from the dead, when one reads that they could listen to such an exposition, from a stranger, of the meaning of the Scriptures, without suspecting their unknown Teacher's identity. It required a series of appearances under circumstances that admitted of no doubt, to convince the friends of Christ of the reality of the resurrection. They found it easier to believe in a ghost than to believe that their Master had taken again by his divine power, the life he had laid down. Even then, when Christ by eating before them, had given proof of the reality of his physical existence, one doubter refused to accept testimony. Nothing short of personal, tangible demonstration would, he declared, satisfy him. Christ condescended to offer it and Thomas was convinced. It is well for us that they were so slow to admit the fact. Their scepticism elicited proofs that might otherwise not have been given—proofs whose value is tested in every generation. The overwhelming attestation of the fact was thus placed beyond question

MARTYRED MISSIONARIES.

FURTHER particulars have now been received of the murder of Dr. and Mrs. Leach and their child, briefly announced in this journal last week. The devoted family, whose portraits appear on this page,

MRS. LEACH AND CHILD.

They were murdered on May 7th in their Mission station at Sfax, which is about two hundred miles south of Tunis. The crime is believed to be the work of fanatical Mohammedans. There were no witnesses of it. Some reports of violence reached the ears of the British Vice-consul at Sfax and he accompanied by the Commissary, went to the station on May 8, to see what the trouble was. The sight that met their eyes was appalling. Dr. Leach's body was pierced by ten awful gashes, lay upon the floor. Near it was the body of his wife whom he appeared to have been defending when cut down. She had received four separate stabs. A little way off was the body of their six-year-old son whose throat had been cut. In a cradle in another room was an infant of a few months who was crying pitifully. It was the only living creature in the house who had escaped the assassins. All the rooms were in confusion, the furniture broken and the things scattered about. From the appearance of the house and the bodies it is conjectured that Dr. Leach fought bravely, but was overpowered, and driven, still fighting, to his bedroom in which he locked himself with his wife and child. The savage murderers appear to have battered down the door of the room and to have completed their shocking work there with diabolical ferocity.

Dr. Leach had been at Sfax since August of last year. Prior to that time he had spent six years as medical missionary in Persia. He was originally sent out by the City Baptist Church in West Fifty-fifth street, New York, of which Dr. Lighton Williams is pastor. He was the son of a Surgeon-Major in the English army, and was born at Rangoon, Burmah, thirty-six years ago.

He studied at Edinburgh University and there received his surgeon's diploma. For a few years he acted as surgeon on several vessels, and as resident surgeon of a Children's Hospital in England. But his heart was set on missionary labor, and ten years ago, during a sojourn in New York, he made arrangements with the Amity Baptist Church to go out as a medical missionary from that church. After two years he joined the North African Mission and removed to Tunis. There, for six years, he patiently labored among natives, Moors and Jews, and opened a dispensary for poor patients, treating with skill and free of charge, all who came. He was greatly beloved by all classes and nationalities. Last August, feeling that the work in Tunis was well established, and that he could be spared for pioneer work, he went to Sfax and opened a mission station there. His widespread popularity among the people rendered him absolutely fearless. He went alone with his wife and child to Sfax, and intended to conduct the mission until it was ready to be handed over to a successor. Mrs. Leach was a native of Rothsay, Scotland. She was in charge of a Sailors' Mission at Marseilles before her marriage to Dr. Leach. The death of this devoted pair has caused widespread sorrow not only to their numerous personal friends, but to the people of Tunis, who remember them with loving gratitude. Like their Master they died at the hands of the people whose welfare they sought and to whom they had come with the message of life for body and soul. Their cruel death is one of the mysteries of God's providence which will continue to puzzle us until we obtain the clearer vision that will come in the light of his presence. It would have seemed to human reason that a special protection would have been about lives so noble and useful, but God's ways are not as our ways.

The Gospel on the Zambesi.

The veteran missionary, M. Coillard, on leaving Zambesi for a furlough in France, made necessary by a protracted illness, has sent a touching letter to the directors of the Societe des Missions Evangeliques de Paris.

With the aid of native boys he had made his sorrowful preparations and had said farewell to the people for whom he has toiled and suffered so much. The king said to him: "Ah, if I am not yet saved it is not your fault. You have given yourself no rest, but neither have you given me any!" Writing of the affectionate care of his boy pupils, Monsieur Coillard says: "Semmonji, especially, has made an admirable nurse, foreseeing or divining my wants, trying to tempt my appetite and to make my room cheerful and doing everything earnestly, joyously, and noiselessly. He has never left me day or night. At night, when the dear little fellow spreads his mat at the foot of my bed, he pours out his heart in supplications, asking a little relief, a little sleep for 'his father, the old servant of God.' And, through the night, instantly on his feet at the first call! The dear boy, learning of my resolve to leave the country to seek medical aid, instantly entreated not to be left behind. He did not want to quit me till I should be better—he would go wherever I went." "And if I should go to Europe?" "Very well; he would go." As to Nyondo. "Poor boy! every time that my departure is spoken of he bows his head upon his knees and begins to weep." Monsieur Coillard goes on to say that his leaving Africa is a complete overturning of his plans and wishes, but that "a ray of light illumines his darkness and sorrow." "What a difference between this journey and that of 1881! Then not a soul in this vast region who knew even the name of the Lord."

THE WAR ON THE NILE.

ALTHOUGH there has been no important engagement fought thus far, in the Nile campaign, there is every probability that stirring events may be expected in Egypt in the near future. The progress of the Anglo-Egyptian military movement for the occupation of advanced positions on the Upper Nile, and with a view to the ultimate recovery of Berber and Khartoum, is proceeding with steady rapidity. The railway from Sarras, passing by the Second Cataract, is being laid at the rate of one mile daily, and now extends beyond the Ambigol road and to the Murad Wells: it will be completed to Akasheh by the end of June. Permanent garrisons have been placed in fortified positions at Sarras and other stations to the front. A Camel Corps is at Wady Halfa, and will be of great service in scouting over the Nubian Desert.

These arrangements on the banks of the Nile, under the supervision of General Sir H. Kitchener, the Sirdar or Commander-in-Chief of the Khedive's army, have been connected with the recent active movements of the garrisons at Suakim and Tokar, by which Osman Digna's section of the Mahdist or Dervish forces has been driven back from the coast region of the Red Sea, and is likely soon to be altogether expelled from the Eastern Soudan. It is announced at Simla, the headquarters of the British Indian Government, that that expected, however, that he will be able to oppose an effective advance of the Anglo-Egyptian forces.

Osman Digna has had a strangely eventful career. He has been repeatedly reported as dead, but has unfailingly come to the front in every recent period of military activity among the dervishes and Mahdists. His father was a Turkish slave-trader, and his mother an Arab of the Hadendowa tribe. With his brother, Ahmed, he carried on the business of a slave-trader for many years, with his headquarters at Suakim, and branches at Khartoum, Berber, Kassala, el-Obeid, and in the Equatorial Province. His trade was broken up by the British in 1883, and a number of his slave dhows, or boats, captured in the Red Sea and destroyed. Osman was eager for vengeance, and offered to raise a force in the Eastern Soudan, and the Mahdi conferred on him the title of Emir.

The Khalifa, who is the leader of the desert tribesmen, has an army of not less than 140,000 men, of whom 40,000 are riflemen, 60,000 spearmen, and 6,000 cavalry. All his arms are greatly inferior to those of the Anglo-Egyptian troops, less than half of his rifles being in good condition. Should the "jihad," or "holy war," be proclaimed by the Khalifa, the result would be to summon the entire fighting strength of the Soudan, and thus greatly augment the forces of the Anglo-Egyptian army would have to face in the field.

A Buddhist Saint.

In the Buddhist journals of Japan some remarkable stories are related concerning Enmo-gio-ja, the founder of the Shugen sect of Buddhists. These stories are fair examples of heathen beliefs. He was born about 665 A. D., in the village of Chihara, Japan. From infancy he exhibited wonderful ability, and was wise and active. Especially he read the Buddhist Scriptures introduced from Korea. In his thirty-second year he went out to lead a life of homelessness and self-mortification among the Katsuragi Mountains. For more than thirty years he lived alone in a rocky cavern in the mountains and practiced self-mortification, clothing his body with the leaves of ivy grass and feeding on the fruits of pine trees, to attain the superhuman powers. After this he went to Mt. Mino-o, in the province of Settsu. There he sat upon a rock near a great cataract. One day, in a vision, he entered the waterfall, was presented to a great deity, and received the Kujaku-myo-o-kio scripture. When he awoke, there was in his hand a copy of the book. He built there a monastery which he called Mino-o-tema, dedicated to Nagara-juna, and it stands to this day. It is also told that when he was exiled, he made daily visits to the top of Mt. Fuji. To-day pious people form parties and make pilgrimages to these sacred mountains, where it is said En had once manifested his wonderful powers and left many marvelous marks which are pointed out to pilgrims. They are usually led by one or two "Adepts," or Sendachi. These adepts are said to be able to perform various miracles: to de-vour keen-edged swords without any injury to them; to swallow red-hot iron balls; to breathe flaming fire; to walk on the surface of water; and to travel through the air.

OSMAN DIGNA AND HIS DERVISHES IN THE SOUDANESE DESERT

portion of the East African littoral temporarily is to be put under the military protection of the government, in order that the Egyptian troops may be removed to Wady Halfa, to join in the advance towards Dongola. A force of the Indian native army has sailed for the Red Sea, and will co-operate with the Anglo-Egyptian troops in their operations against the dervishes.

Our illustration on this page, from a drawing published in the London Illustrated News, shows a group of dervishes, with Osman Digna in their midst, on the march through the desert. These warlike people are determined to resist to the last ditch, the Anglo-Egyptian advance, and a resolute struggle may be expected. Osman Digna has already displayed striking qualities as a military leader, and with the large numerical dervish and mahdist strength at his command, will doubtless make a strong stand. It is hardly to be expected, however, that he will be able to oppose an effective advance of the Anglo-Egyptian forces.

THE NEW A. M. E. BISHOPS.

The African Methodist Episcopal Conference Elects Drs. Derrick, Armstrong, and Embury to the Bishopric.

LIKE their brethren of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the ministers and delegates of the African Methodist Episcopal Conference have had the responsible duty of choosing from among themselves three men for the Bishopric. On this page we give a portrait of the well-known clergyman who was the first choice of the Conference, Rev. W. B. Derrick, D.D. It was a significant and well-merited tribute to his many excellences that Dr. Derrick was elected on the first ballot. Of the 310 votes cast, 204 were given to him, forty-three more than were necessary to a choice. Dr. Derrick is evidently a popular man among his brethren, and he enters upon his Episcopal duties with the the most cordial wishes for the success of his new career. The Conference had the advantage of knowing a good deal of the new bishop. Dr. Derrick has given it eight years of valuable and efficient service as Secretary of Missions, and prior to his election in 1888, he was pastor of the large church in Sullivan St., New York, and other important churches. It is therefore into no new or untried hands the Conference commits the responsibilities of the office of a bishop. His brethren have recognized the devotion and energy with which he has discharged the duties of the positions to which he has been called, and have said to him, as the Master of the Feast in the Gospels said to his guest, "Friend, go up higher." Dr. Derrick is to be congratulated on attaining the office of bishop, which St. Paul declared was "a good thing," and the church is to be congratulated on securing his services.

Dr. Derrick is a native of Antigua in the West Indies, and is in his fifty-second year. He came to this country in 1860, and two years later, though only nineteen years of age, he offered his services to the Union in the struggle it was then waging with the South. He entered the United States navy, and from that time to the close of the war saw a good deal of service. After the war was over the young colored sailor connected with a Methodist Episcopal Church, and his abilities soon marked him out for useful service. He was ordained deacon and elder, and served with success in various parts of New York State, and then to the Secretaryship of Missions, from which he now retires to become a bishop. His friends in this city will be glad to hear that he is respected him have marked their sense of his worth by inviting him to the Bethel Church in Twenty-fifth street, and presenting him with a handsome testimonial.

The church over which Dr. Derrick is now to preside is the largest in the world, with members in over 100,000 churches in all the continents. It has many branches in the West Indies, British Guiana, Florida, the East India Islands, and other countries. Previous to the last Conference it had twelve bishops, and when the Conference met there were four vacancies to be filled that had been caused by death during the four years since the meeting of the preceding Conference. It was, however, deemed advisable to rearrange the dioceses and increase their sizes so that only three new bishops were needed. The ministers chosen with Dr. Derrick were Drs. Joseph H. Armstrong and James C. Embury.

The Philafrican League.

An important meeting of gentlemen interested in the promotion of the objects and purposes of the Philafrican Liberator's League, in its efforts to liberate and educate the native slaves in Africa, was held at the parlors of the Y. M. C. A., Twenty-third street, New York, lately. Rev. L. T. Chamberlain, D.D., presided. There was an informal discussion of the plans of the League, and steps were taken looking to an organization for making its work effective. A Committee on Constitution was chosen, consisting of Judge Charles P. Daly, Drs. Josiah Strong and L. T. Chamberlain, Dr. Louis Klopsch, Paul Du Chaillu, C. C. Adams, and Rev. John H. Edwards, D.D. An Executive Committee of three was also appointed, its members being the Chairman, Dr. Chamberlain, Dr. Strong, and Dr. Edwards. Reports will be presented at an early meeting and the organization will then be perfected.

An Image of Gold.

At one of the meetings of the Sunday School Union in London lately, Mr. C. Waters, a Christian worker, remarked that while in college in Bristol he had heard of a workman who, passing through a poor part of the city one day, saw in a pawnbroker's shop an image which attracted his attention. Enquiring the price, he purchased it for the modest sum of three pence, and took it home. He washed the image, and, while polishing it, noticed that what he had supposed to be iron began to shine, rousing a hope in him that it might prove to be brass. Further polishing raised his hopes still higher, and he carried it to a goldsmith, who pronounced it gold, and estimated its value at £2,000 sterling ($10,000). Eventually he got $15,000 for it, and this sum was the foundation of one of the large manufacturing businesses of Bristol. The pawn broker had been perfectly unconscious of the treasure lying in his shop. Is it not sometimes the same with God's Word? Do they always realize the treasure lying hidden in their Bibles?

The Dying Believer.

Lines suggested by the death of Richard Weaver, Evangelist.

EARTH with its vanities no more
Shall pain my weary eyes,
I leave my prison for my home,
A mansion in the skies.
Though death extends his icy hand,
No terror does he bring,
Oh, grave! where is thy victory?
Oh, death! where is thy sting?

All that the world calls good or great,
Recedes before my view,
Its honors, riches, pleasures, joys—
Its pomp and splendor, too.
All these I leave without regret—
I go to meet my King;
Oh, grave! where is thy victory?
Oh, death! where is thy sting?

Weep not dear friends, nor mourn for me,
Oh! stay the falling tear,
The righteous in his death has hope,
He has no cause to fear.
List! and my feeble death-bed song
Shall make my chamber ring—
Oh, grave! where is thy victory?
Oh, death! where is thy sting?

My resting place, the lonely grave—
No terror has for me,
'Tis but the passage to the skies,
To immortality.
Entranced, with thoughts of Jesus' death,
I am with rapture song,
Oh, grave! where is thy victory?
Oh, death! where is thy sting?

My struggling spirit longs to burst
From prison house of clay,
And join the angels, round my bed,
Who praise our heavenly day.

My soul shall breathe these parting words,
While mounting on the wing,
Oh, grave! where is thy victory?
Oh, death! where is thy sting?

Through fields of light and joy and love,
Uplifted, I shall roam,
Until I see the portals open
Of my eternal home.

Angels! shut out the portals back,
And I will come—
Oh, grave! where is thy victory?
Oh, death! where is thy sting?

National Headquarters were established in Chicago, with Dr. H. W. Bolton, known from Maine to California for his patriotism and piety, as Commander-in-Chief; Mr. O. L. Rickard, formerly adjutant of the B.B.B., and the man to whom, more than to any one other, the consolidation was due, as Adjutant-General; P. S. Henson, D.D., the witty and eloquent Baptist Divine, as Chaplain-in-Chief; and Dr. C. C. O'Byrne, as Surgeon-General. The Board of Trustees is composed of Fredk. L. Chapman, of Chicago, Ill.; Llewellyn Caley, of Pennsylvania; James M. Smith, of Minnesota; A. C. Kenyon, of New York; E. A. Girvin, of California; E. M. Fuller, of Massachusetts, besides many others, prominent in religious and philanthropic circles.

The progress of the movement in the United Kingdom, has been phenomenal indeed. Starting with thirty rough and boisterous lads, banded in one company, they have, according to the Secretary's report for the year 1895, 742 companies, with 32,379 boys and 2,559 officers. Canada has over 100 companies, with about 4,000 boys. The West Indies with 26 companies, and over 800 boys, several isolated companies in India, Australia, New Zealand, and South American countries, not to mention the twenty-two companies and 700 boys in South Africa, prove beyond a doubt that, as a missionary movement, it is meeting with marked success.

And now we have come to our own country: In the short time from 1889 to the present, we know of over one thousand companies, embracing in the neighborhood of 60,000 boys, and about 4,000 officers. National Headquarters has done much for the individual company, and is going to do more, but they have been unable so far to gather any reliable statistics. Requests for reports have, in the majority of cases, been unanswered. This is in part due to the independent spirit, and partly to the expense which such statistics would necessarily entail on the different corps.

The financial problem has been the hardest difficulty that has stood in the way of advancement. The movement is essentially a self-supporting one, and each company has all it can do to support itself, so that headquarters has been severely handicapped in its efforts. A small revenue is derived from the sale of official supplies to the companies, also from charters, commissions and warrants, and from the official organ, The Knapsack. This difficulty has been entirely and successfully overcome in Great Britain by means of company subscriptions, and sustaining memberships, yearly subscriptions of from one to twenty-five pounds sterling, by wealthy men who see and understand that it is money more than well invested. Some such plan will doubtless have an early adoption here. The near future will witness a perfect and well-organized central government, with direct and prompt communication with the most remote outposts.

A fair estimate of numerical strength may be gathered from the above, but it is as nothing compared with the spiritual results. For the year 1894, thirteen per cent. of the enrolled membership of the Boys' Brigade joined the church. There is not another Christian organization in the world that can point to a record as large. Statistics for 1895 have not been gathered, for the same reason that the numerical strength was not taken, but many accounts similar to the following are constantly coming in: The First Santa Barbara, California, Company has transformed forty street urchins into manly, church members. One Pennsylvania company paid entirely for the erection chapel in the west during the year. The Fulton Guards of Cincinnati, a company with an enrolled membership of sixty-six, all fully armed and equipped, report sixty-two of these as church members. Col. Perrigo, of New Haven, reports ten men who joined the church from his own company in one month. In addition to this the attendance at Sunday School has increased fifty per cent. the formation of the Brigade, the majority of whom are males. Before the company was formed two-thirds were girls.

Pennsylvania company, number 19, report twenty per cent. of the boys as having joined the church since formation. This company is connected with the Reformed Church of Philadelphia.

The following extract from a speaks for itself:

CONCORD, NEW HAMPSHIRE.
DEAR SIR:—Nearly every boy in the company gave himself to Jesus in solemn covenant this morning. Very few of the parents are Christians. The Boys' Brigade for the results.

A company recently organized in Louis, Mo., report ten of the boys as having joined the church since formation, and twenty have stopped chewing and smoking. Clarendon Street Baptist Church was the scene of a soul-stirring incident on January 22nd, 1896. Connected with the church is a Boys' Brigade, has for three years been in charge of L. A. Holman. The third Wednesday, January was chosen as a time when attention of the company should be fixed strictly to the question of accepting Christ. After the leader's talk he said that those of the boys who were willing at that time to make the great profession so publicly. One after another boys got up, until all had risen and dividual instances of the Holy Spirit's power, but the above will, we believe, be sufficient to give some idea of results. In 1894 as a basis for calculation, figure that at least six thousand boys have taken Christ for their Saviour in 1895, and publicly united with people of God, all this directly trace to the agency of the Boys' Brigade.

Opposition there has been, and obstacles to overcome. Alarmists and other people have said that we were drilling and training boys to fight. Well, so we are—train them to fight the devil and his hosts, training them to fight against vice and every form, training them up into Christian men who will accept no compromise from evil, save unconditional surrender. Look at it also in another light: suppose war, real war should come; to whom would we better entrust our forts and battleships than to men trained in coats of buff and under the stars and stripes, to the Bibles as well as peaceful guns, and love God and man? The plan has been to let works rather than words be the refutation of all opposition. That this method has been successful is becoming daily more evident. The future opens before us limitless possibilities, and a no distant date will see a mighty army of Christian young men marching on to victory. Christ, their Commander-in-chief, us then sound the keynote of unity, O boys for Christ, for our country, and good government and Christian hearts all over this broad land.

Arbutus Buds.

UNDER the brown pine needles close to the foot of the old oak, half-way up Pittsfield Mountain, close down—yer know the spot, Cynthia—one always finds the thickest, sweetest, pinkest clusters of the arbutus. I always gather in the spring, and bring it home to my mama, for she loves all out-doors more than ever, now that she can't walk out since her stroke. But I never knew, till the very year, that my darling flowers could help build a parsonage for some good people who were living in a dug-out.

It happened this way, Cynthia: I read your dear paper that if anybody would send arbutus, nicely picked and packed in cotton, and laid straight and orderly in small boxes, to a certain street and number in town, people would buy them, and the money go to build a minister's house. So, I was bound to help. If I do it up-country, and only see the city once in two or three years, I don't mean to be out o' what's goin' on, and no more I won't. I'm doin' my share here, and other folks are doing theirs there, and between them, the Lord's work is being done.

Cynthia Varden, when I hear about the need o' Sunday Schools and churches in new homes and mining districts way on the frontier, and when I say to myself that the devil's never short-handed, I'm always on the alert with his saloons and his gambling shops, and his tempters, men and woman, and woman worse than men every time, I just up and wonders what the church is about. A sermon I hear rings in my ears. The text was, 'There remaineth much land to be possessed.' Well, I mean to help go an' possess it, and the home missionary and his wife, they are settin' about it in dead earnest.

It never seems quite fair that they're to do the hard end of the work all through. Still salary, old clothes, plain food, loneliness, second-hand reading, and a dug-out to live in, when if we'd every one take a hand, with a long pull, and a strong pull, and a pull all together, we'd change the scene of affairs. Trouble is we Christians fit play at missions; that's what old Dr. T. said, and he spoke the truth.

I'm arrivin' at the arbutus, Cynthia. I ain't hurry me. I'll take my time. I can't move out o' this kitchen anyhow till the bread's baked, an' it ain't more'n half done yet. When I heard that city people'd give twenty-five cents a box for arbutus, I couldn't hardly accept that present, but, I know by the summer orders, city people's dreadful free with their money. It's light come, light go with them. They don't make it sellin' butter an' eggs. An' they've a right to do as they're a mind to.

I never saw anything purer and lovelier than the arbutus this spring. It had been such a late, tantalizin', didn't-know-when-opinion sort of spring, that when at last the things began to grow, and the world began to laugh in the sun, we didn't know what to make of it. It was rise up in love, my fair one, and come away. Every blue-bird sang that, and every robin fluted it, and every jenny wren and song sparrow kept sayin' it over an' over.

I followed our arbutus, Cynthia, or what it turned into, across the continent. My child! Not in drawing-room cars, but by the invisible lightning express, the airline of thought, fastest flyer in the universe.

And out in Dakota what should I hear but hammers and saws a-goin' an' a buzzin', a whirr'in', an' a whizzin', and a frame 'n' up yellow and tall, and pretty children clappin' their hands, and men comin' and givin' hull days' works, when they hadn't money to give, an' women plannin' what they'd do when the time come fur them to do, an' a parsonage risin' up, out of the flowers of trailin' arbutus picked on Pittsfield Mountain. And I said, Cynthia, with reverence, 'this is the Lord's doin', an' it's marvellous in our eyes!'

"I agree with you, Cynthia, that a soul's a soul in one place as well as another. The Lord isn't one to show partiality among his children. He said, 'And other sheep I have, them also I must bring!' But it's easier to reach the sheep in some pastures than others, and the shepherd that goes out in the desert places to find the lost ones, needs brave, loving people to help him, or he'll grow discouraged. So, I believe in doin' what we can for the home missionary, not only in the line of giving him must-haves, but with a few luxuries thrown in.

"When that parsonage is finished, I'm goin' to move that we ladies in our church raise the money to send the mistress of the manse a melodeon, and music to play on it. We can do it just as well as not, Cynthia, and enjoy our own parlor organs better for havin' done it.

Now, Cynthia, this bread's baked. Light, sweet loaves crust browned, white inside, tastes like a nut. When you go home you shall have a loaf to take to your mother, and a bunch of arbutus, too. We haven't had to pick it all for the western parsonage. "The Lord's so lavish, Cynthia. Not stingy and meechin' like us. Millions of stars, millions of waves, millions of flowers, I tell you what, we needn't go 'round like paupers, when we've got such a rich Father. The Lord's lavish, Cynthia, lavish!"

Motes that had a Mission.

JAMES HODSON was a Christian, but his brother John was not. John had a creed, however. He believed the heart by nature was not more prone to evil than to good, and that by moral culture the good would predominate and subdue the evil. "How is it," John said, "that you Christians are forever prating about the heart's depravity? Cultivate it as you cultivate your garden, and it will yield wholesome products and the fair flowers of virtue. Believe me, James, the cultured heart is not a bad place. After taking a peep into my own I feel quite comfortable." James quietly stepped to the window, and raising the blind let in a sunbeam. Instantly myriads of motes were seen, moving like living things through the room. "John, how came these motes into the room?" "Oh, they were here, but we could not see them until revealed by the sunshine." "Just so," replied James, "when a beam of the Sun of Righteousness enters the un-renewed heart, it reveals a motley multitude of unclean things, before invisible: 'the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, the pride of life,' all its secret sins are brought to light." John was silent. There came a look of trouble into his face. He wandered about restlessly. Wherever he went the motes danced before his eyes; he could not get rid of them, and they seemed to cry, "unclean, unclean!" A shaft of divine truth, a ray of Christ's glorious light, had entered his soul. In that light his self-righteousness shrank away abashed. He now saw his heart, "deceitful above all things and desperately wicked." He found no peace until he had given his broken and contrite heart to the Saviour. The mission of the motes was accomplished.

Russia's Young Princess.

Grand Duchess Olga, the baby of the Czar and Czarina of Russia, is one of the most important little personages at the great coronation festivities lately held in the ancient city of Moscow. It will doubtless be a sad reminder of her babyhood, should she live to reach a woman's years, to be told that on her first great public appearance, a calamity occurred that overshadowed the whole Empire. The little one is, of course, a prime favorite at Court. Alexandra Feodorovna, her royal mother listens with a pleased ear to the petty flatteries which the courtiers bestow on her baby. She knows that not titles or dignities can make the child happy, for the Empress is reputed to be a woman of excellent understanding and a Christian mother who will train her little daughter well. Our illustration is from a recent photograph taken in St. Petersburg.

The True Story of Armenia.

There are indications that point to an early recurrence of the Armenian outrages. Already the civilized world has learned to distrust Turkey's promises of peace and protection for the Sultan's Christian subjects. But to those who are familiar with the story of the recent horrors in Armenia, as graphically disclosed in Rev. F.A. Greene's book, The Rule of the Turk, it will not be a surprise to hear of almost any new atrocity. Mr. Greene has let in more light upon the character of the Moslem ruler and his surroundings than any other modern writer. He has had the advantage of a life of residence and study in the East and his narrative of the sufferings of the Armenian fathers, mothers, and daughters—the bravery of the men and the matchless fidelity of the women—will appeal to every sympathetic heart. Mr. Greene is a missionary and a missionary's son, and his entire book is based on personal observation and accurate information. This finely illustrated volume originally published at fifty cents, can be had (in paper covers), postage paid, by sending twenty-five cents to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

He Knows.

HE knows the bitter, weary way.
The endless striving day by day.
The souls that weep, the souls that pray,
He knows!
He knows how hard the fight hath been.
The clouds that came our lives between.
The wounds the world has never seen
He knows!
He knows when faint and worn we sink,
How deep the pain, how near the brink
Of dark despair we pause and shrink;
He knows!
He knows! oh, thought so full of bliss!
For though on earth our joy we miss,
We still can bear it, feeling this.—
He knows!
He knows: O heart, take up thy cross
And know earth's treasures are but dross,
And he will prove as gain our loss!
He knows!

Early Egyptian Tablets.

How the Letter-writers of 3000 Years Ago Conducted their Correspondence.

FROM the earliest records of civilized man, it is apparent that the written letter—in some form, crude, perhaps, but yet intelligible—has been the means of conveying ideas from mind to mind across great distances. From the clay tablets dug up in Egypt and Palestine within the last twenty-five years, much has been gathered concerning the early civilization of those countries. It is a profound mistake to suppose, as some people do, that these ancient writings are at variance with the authoritative Scriptures in any essential particular. The knowledge so attained is not altogether new, nor does it conflict with that which has been deduced from other records.

It is well known to scholars, says a writer in the Edinburgh Review, that Thothmes III., when he defeated the league of Hittites and Phoenicians at Megiddo in 1600 B. C. (a century before Amenophis III. acceded), reaped a spoil which indicates the advanced civilization of Syria, including not only the precious metals and chariots painted and plated, but also objects of art having a high aesthetic value, and that he found corn, wine, and oil abundant in the country, and many hundreds of walled towns, in which there were already temples of heathen gods. Such evidence has, however, been slighted by those who regard the early Hebrews as uncivilized, and who think that, though placed in the very centre of the ancient civilized world between the Egyptians and the Assyrians, they were, nevertheless, unacquainted with any arts and uninfluenced by surrounding culture.

The new discoveries insist on quite another understanding of their ancient history. It is surely a lesson of humility that the modern student should learn from such discoveries. One author finds it hard to believe that Homer's poems could have been written down before 500 B. C., and asserts that papyrus had not been invented in Egypt in the time of Moses, though we now possess in the maxims of Ptahhotep, a manuscript as old as the pyramids. We find, on the contrary, that not only in Egypt or Mesopotamia was the art of writing known in the time of Moses, but that the inhabitants of Palestine also could pen a brick epistle, which in the space of a few inches contained as much information as can now be condensed into a sheet of note-paper. Such letters were neither heavy nor bulky, and could be carried in the turban or in the folds of the shirt-bosom just as easily as paper letters are now so carried, with the additional advantage that they were imperishable, as witnessed by the fact that they are now being read three thousand five hundred years after they were written. In the brick tablets of the East we have absolute proof of a high civilization in most remote times.

Parisian Street-Car Travel.

Within the last few weeks a new feature in street-car travel has been introduced in Paris. The car shown in the illustration is driven by gas instead of steam or electricity. Thus far the experiment is said to have proved satisfactory, being less expensive and less dangerous than several other methods of propulsion. A considerable crowd assembled in the Place de la Concorde to witness the trial. It is proposed to extend the system to other cities in France.

Preaching Christ.

YOUNG ministers are told they must preach Christ and him crucified. Yes, but not as an abstraction. Many a minister has preached Christ and him crucified in such a way that he preached an audience of five hundred down to two hundred, and from two hundred to one hundred, and from one hundred to fifty, and from fifty to twenty, and on down until there was little left save the sexton, who was paid to stay until the service was over and lock up. It is not Christ and him crucified as an abstraction, but as an omnipotent sympathy applied to all the wants and woes of our immortal nature—a Christ who will help us in every domestic, social, financial, political, national struggle—a Christ for the parlor, a Christ for the nursery, a Christ for the kitchen, a Christ for the barn, a Christ for the street, a Christ for the store, a Christ for the banking-house, a Christ for the factory, a Christ for the Congressional assembly, a Christ for the court-room, a Christ for every trial, and every emergency, and every perturbation.

It is often the case that the difficulty begins clear back in the home circle with misapprehension as to which child ought to be consecrated to the ministry. John is a keen, bright boy. He is good at a bargain. When he trades at school he always gets the best of it. Make him a merchant. He will soon gather a fortune, and go right up to take his place among the Grinnells and the Lawrences. George has great cerebral development. Phenologically, language is large. Make him a lawyer. He will argue his way to the front, and he will take his place among the Mansfields and the Storrs. Henry has large girth at the chest, and is military in step and bearing. Send him to West Point. We shall see him yet a brigadier-general. William is fond of sketching, especially of sketching ships, and he knows as much about a vessel as an old sailor. Make him a ship-builder; the vessel that he builds will successfully wrestle with the Caribbean whirlwind. Aleck is not very well. He has never had very good digestion. Since the war he has been a little out of shape. He will not be a very big figure at one figure in the carpet. His manners are so so mild, so soft, so gentle, so affectionate, so heavenly, and he cries easily. Make him a minister!

Now, that is a great mistake. If you make him a minister, he will be a failure.

awake, the brainiest, the most brilliant, the most irresistible, the most potent. A tremendous work opens before a profession whose one object is to lift the nations toward God and prepare them for heaven. Churches will be largely attended just in proportion as we ministers can meet their wants, meet their sufferings, meet their bereavements, and meet their sympathies. If there be a church with small help, small audience; medium help, medium audience; large help, large audience. If there be a famine in a city and three depots of bread, and one depot have a hundred loaves, and another depot five hundred loaves, and another depot ten thousand loaves, the depot that has a hundred loaves will have applicants, the depot that has five hundred loaves will have far more applicants, the depot that has ten thousand loaves, throngs, throngs, throngs.

Freshen Up.

THE old modes of presenting truth will not do in this day. This is true concerning the religious newspaper, or pulpit. What is the use of our being stale and obsolete and ancient when all around us are the evidences of God's grace, God's deliverance, God's mercy and God's wisdom? We have got to freshen up—freshen up in our sermons, freshen up in our songs, freshen up in our zeal, freshen up in our consecration, and if we do it, we will no more have to coax people to come to church than if you throw corn on the ground you have to coax pigeons to come and eat it, no more than you would have to coax a tired horse to eat the oats you throw in his manger. Yes, we must freshen up in our Sunday Schools, and in our pulpits. If Christ should descend to earth to-day, do you suppose he would deal with dry didactics? No; he would tell England how she must treat Ireland, and Ireland how she must treat England, and who ought to be Mayor and who ought to be President, and he would draw his illustrations from the year 1896. There is only one thing to do, and that is for the live churches of America just to go up and take the cities, fretting about nothing, scolding about nothing, worrying about nothing, taking in good nature the easy and cheap charge of sentimentalism—for every church that does not get on well will charge every church that does get on well with sentimentalism—going right on, taking everything in good humor, gathering the people in by scores and thousands, getting them soundly, grandly, gloriously, eternally converted with the old-fashioned conversion that has a half-dozen hallelujahs in it.

Let the Church of God stop its apologetic air. It is high time that the Church of God stopped writing apologies for Christianity. Let the men who are on the outside, who despise religion, write the apologies. If any people do not want the Church, they need not have it. It is a free country. If any man does not want the Gospel, he need not have it. It is a free country. But you go out, O people of God, and give the Gospel to the sixty millions of people of America who do want it. It is high time we stop skirmishing, and bring on a general engagement.

Battle and Victory.

LET our patriotism be not merely a sentiment explosive and noisy and pyrotechnic with Fourth of July, but during all our lives a holy impulse toward brave and self-sacrificing deeds. But why go so far away to find great events when in each one of our lives there is a Yorktown to be captured or surrendered? There come after long contests great victories. We fight against poverty or persecution or sickness, and then comes the day of rest. We have great struggles like Bunker Hill, but the struggle still goes on; and like Monmouth, but the strife does not end; and exposure like Valley Forge, but our sufferings are not ended; cold and icy rivers to cross like the Delaware in revolutionary times, yet our war is not over; but at last comes Yorktown, and our enemies or our troubles or our sicknesses surrender, and the war is forever closed. Thank God for the prospective cessation of all that now perturbs us. Only go down on the Avenue and see the triumph of one of God's children. She was converted in our last great revival. I saw her near the grave with the most illumined and radiant face I ever gazed on. When I addressed her with the words, "You have nothing to fear, she said, "I have nothing to fear. Heaven used to seem to me a great way off, but it is now no further than the foot of the bed." After the suffering, the release; after the fatigue, the rest; after the darkness, the light; after the battle, the victory. At that Yorktown, pain and sorrow and death surrendered. Over such a release the poet wrote:

So she took the one grand step
Beyond the stars of God,
Into the splendor shadowless and broad,
Into the everlasting joy and light,
The zenith of the earthly life had come.

OUR MAIL-BAG.

W. R. W., Flintstone, Md. Please inform me through THE MAIL-BAG the meaning of the letters I.N.R.I. seen on most pictures of the crucifixion?

They are the initials for Iesus Nazarenus Rex Judaeorum (Jesus of Nazareth, King of the Jews).

M. D. McFarland, Walkerville, Ont., writes:

I saw your notice in your paper with reference to some books for the jails, and I am a jail worker, also a subscriber. I wish to get some. Other friends and myself take turns at the jail here, being about once a month.

J. D. R., Kinzers, Pa. Why do not all people repent and follow the Saviour? or, what is the greatest hindrance to repentance?

The innate love of sin and the allurements of the worldly life are the great hindrances. It is the war of the flesh and its lusts against the spirit. People will not repent until convicted of sin and feeling in their hearts the "godly sorrow that worketh repentance." (II Cor. 8:11)

J. G. Evans, Rome, N. Y., writes:

I was glad to see in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD under the title, "America's Only Hope," that there is in contemplation an immigration scheme in behalf of the poor people of that country. I pray and hope there shall be every encouragement given them to carry out that scheme. My heart is bleeding in sympathy for them. If the scheme can be carried out, I would pledge $200,000 to help it. If the Island of Cyprus can shelter 200,000, let the rest of them come to the United States. Maybe the old Sultan will not let the objects of his hatred depart from his dominion, after all.

S. L., Easton, N. Y. What are Dominical letters referred to in almanacs and how are they fixed?

The first seven letters of the alphabet are used for Dominical letters. The first week of the year marks the letter, each day being identified with a letter, and the one identified with Sunday being the Dominical letter for the year. January 1, is always represented by the letter A. If it falls on a Sunday, A is the Dominical letter for the year. If it falls on a Saturday, B is the Dominical letter for the year and so on. In Leap years the Dominical letter changes after February 29. If it is B at the beginning of the year, it becomes A in March.

B. E. C., Rock Rapids, Ia. Do the terrible words in Ezek. 33:24, imply that those who hope for a person who after conversion falls into sin?

No, they mean that a person living in sin and trusting to some past experience or ceremony for escape from punishment is deceiving himself. There are people who think that membership in a church or absolution from a priest is sufficient to insure them going to heaven no matter how they live. Ezekiel's words apply to such people. God is always ready to forgive the backslider who goes to him sincerely repenting, though chastening may be administered if it is for his good.

Lover of Jesus, Fort Mill, S. C. What South Sea Islands are included in Christianity, and what progress is being made toward winning the "lost lands"? I am a Christian, and I feel that God has put it into my heart to be a "Herald of the Cross" in some South Sea island, and I would like to know which are the most needy.

Missionary work in the South Sea Islands has been carried on by the London Missionary Society since 1797, and is now very general throughout all the islands. Cannibalism has ceased, and the Gospel is preached in the native tongues on the various island groups which include the Fijis, New Hebrides, Samoa, Society Islands, New Guinea, Loyalty Islands, Cook's Islands, Friendly Islands, Marquesas, Anelyum, and others. There are still many places, however, that are practically new missionary soil. Write to the Secretary, London Missionary Society, London, England, for all information.

One who would be a Christian, Gibbon, Cal. I have been trying to be a Christian for more than a year, and cannot understand why I do not have God and why I cannot keep my thoughts on spiritual things, and why my heart is so cold.

Are you not thinking too much of your own feelings and looking to them for salvation? Remember, it is Christ who saves. He offers to receive you as you are and he will not reject you though your heart be hard and you do no as you should. The fact of his being willing to do so should convince you how good kind he is. Think more of him and love yourself. Try to find out from the Gospel how he wants you to live and try to live that way, being kind and gentle and forgiving with other people, and find some dark ignorant soul that you can talk to about Jesus and his love. He deserves that should do something specially for him. Give yourself some pleasure that you may do kindness to some poor Christian for his sake. Never cease to ask him to soften your heart and he will do it in his own good time. In the meantime, serve him, and if you find it difficult, ask his help. You have no idea how good and sympathetic he is. When you love him better you cannot help loving him.

Mrs. L. E. S., Williamsburg, N. Y. Was it not treatment to exclude the wedding guest 22:11-13 for not having on a wedding garment?

No, he was rightly treated. In Oriental lands, the host provided a suitable garment for each guest at the wedding. This man refused the garment and had come among guests in his ordinary attire. This was a affront to his host. If he preferred his clothes and despised the garments provided, should have absented himself from the feast, but to come in without the garment public insult. Christ used the incident as a lustration of the conduct of men who try in their own moral character and would come to God in the way ordained.

E. B., Jersey City, N. J. 1. Do you think the Samaritan, the Prodigal Son, and Lazarus Dives, were real persons? 2. If they were Lazarus the same man as was referred to a brother of Martha and Mary?

1. It is probable that they were not persons. The stories were typical cases as might have occurred. It was not necessary to Christ's purpose that they should be actual facts. The lesson they were intended to teach was the important matter. That lesson would be more impressive and be more likely to be remembered if put in the form of a story than in the form of an argument. 2. No, the facts recorded about the family at Beth indicate that they were comparatively well-to-do, while the Lazarus of the Parable was a truly poor.

"Inquirer," Troy, N. Y. If a man has been divorced by his wife and he knows that he could not obtain a divorce, but does not for certain reason, would he be justified in contracting a marriage? Is he not really released from the sight of God by his wife's misconduct?

No, he must not marry again until he secured a divorce, otherwise he is liable prosecution for bigamy, and he would be guilty wrong to the person whom he marries. The Christian should set an example of obedience to the law, whereas this man as we infer from your letter, is a Christian who would be breaking the law by marrying before obtaining his divorce. The weighty sons you mention against getting the divorce must operate against a new marriage. Unfortunately, he must not try to escape from his misfortune by breaking the law. That way out is to make bad worse.

S., Minnewaukau, N. D. Suppose an unbeliever should accept Christ or Christianity on the following terms, viz.: I will accept, yield up to Christian influences and live a Christian for a certain period—say one year—until the end of that period or before, I find a living reason to believe in Christ and the Christian religion—a sense of sin forgiven, that "peace that passeth all understanding," and the promises which God's Word hold out to the sincere and obedient child. I will accept him for life and live a Christian life—if I do not feel any change at the end of that period or before, I will give up the religion and think there is nothing in the Christian religion. Do you think God will accept a person on these conditions? The Bible says, "I and see that the Lord is good."

Acceptance of Christ under such conditions is an impossibility. There must be no reservation; the surrender must be total and unconditional. Such restrictions as our correspondent would impose—really amounting to a year's option on eternal life—are proof that he does not comprehend the character and extent of the change involved in giving up the world and coming to Christ. There must be conviction of sin and true repentance, together with a sincere desire for the better life—that is, the spiritual. But it is quite obvious that one cannot sincerely seek such a change at the outset there is a fixed disbelief in God's power and goodness which finds expression in the clause of limitation: "If I do not find a change at the end of that period or before, I will give up the effort." That is not in the sense accepting Christ, however, our correspondent may delude himself about it. If really desires to become a Christian, he must cast all reservation aside, and come to Christ, not as a disputant, but as a child with a child's simple faith. When he has begun to live for eternity and to spend himself for others, he will then better appreciate the reality and uplift of the Christian faith.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

In the Land of the Shah.

RECENT dispatches from Persia report the peaceful succession of Muzaffer-ed-Din to the throne of his father. His elder brother, from whom opposition was most likely to come, made haste to tender homage and showed marked energy in suppressing risings in several parts of his province, which were apparently made in his interest. There have been some outbreaks of lawless violence, but they appear to have had no connection with the secession, but to be the work of brigands and discontented leaders, who hoped to profit by the confusion liable to result from the accession of a new monarch in a country ruled by despotic power. These, however, were promptly put down, and the new Shah has apparently no reason to apprehend any formidable opposition to his government. He has been solemnly enthroned on the famous jeweled chair of state, which was a trophy from Delhi in India, and is said to be the most magnificent seat in the world. The diamonds, rubies, and other precious stones with which it is encrusted are at a modest computation valued at twenty million dollars. The barbaric magnificence characterizes the palaces and all the belongings of the monarch, and it is stated that in his treasury he has over two hundred million dollars. The kingdom over which he rules is small and unimportant compared with its ancient condition. As we know from secular historians and from the books of Esther, Nehemiah, Ezra, and Daniel it was once one of the most powerful of the kingdoms of the world, so that even Babylon fell before it.

The ancient buildings now in ruins, especially those at Ker-manshah, show, too, that the Persians in the day of their glory were not only a powerful and warlike people, but were remarkable for their artistic skill and their scientific knowledge. Their decadence began with their subjugation by the Greeks, and in later times, Russia on the one side and Turkey on the other have fought with them and curtailed their territories. The present Shah is said to be an enlightened ruler with a profound respect for European civilization, but unpopularity for him and his country, he does not know that the secret of power and progress is in obedience to Him of whom Darius, his great predecessor on the Persian throne, declared:

"He is the living God and steadfast forever, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed, and his dominion shall be even unto the end." (Daniel 6:26.)

illed at the Coronation.

A thrill of horror went through the civilized world at the news of the sickening calamity in Moscow, on May 30. In the midst of the jubilation and pageantry of the Czar's coronation, a large number of people, estimated at thirty-six hundred, were crushed or trampled to death. It appears that the programme of the coronation included an enormous feast, to which every subject of the newly crowned monarch was welcome. There was to be food in abundance, and unlimited beer was to be distributed in mugs bearing the portraits of the Czar and Czarina, which were coveted souvenirs of the occasion. The festivities were to be held on the Khodynski plain, an immense level area, which stretches from the front of the Petrovsky palace, far out to the horizon. It is capable of containing millions of people and is memorable as the plain on which Napoleon massed his armies at the taking of Moscow in 1812. Thither streams of people from all quarters of Russia traveled on foot and in quaint country wagons, to partake of the Czar's hospitality. Long before daylight, they began arriving from all directions, until fully half a million persons were on the ground. A space surrounded by Venetian masts, and flanked by booths, was the centre toward which all steps were directed. There were the tables and the stores of bread, cake, sausages, meat-pies, and beer; and the circuses, merry-go-rounds and open-air theatres. The pressure of the people to get to this space and obtain front places, was terrific. Barriers had been erected to prevent excessive crowding, but the people near the barriers were driven against them with the irresistible force of the mighty pressure from the rear. Suddenly the barriers fell and the immense throng swept forward. Hundreds of men, women, and children, fell and were trampled upon. It was impossible to resist the movement from the outer edge of the crowd, and those in front were stumbling and falling over the prostrate bodies, until there was a heap of shrieking, groaning humanity, dying and dead, crushed together in an awful mound. At last some regiments of soldiers made an entrance into the surging tide of excited people, and succeeded in dispersing the crowd and holding it in check. The dead were removed and the wounded, some of whom were scarcely alive, were carried away in ambulance and wagons to the hospitals. The calamity was due to the effort of the later comers to force their way to the desirable places at the feast. There was ample provision for all, and all would have been served if they had been content to wait their turn. But the outsiders would not wait, and in their struggle to make sure of their share of the good things, the weak were thrown down and trampled to death. It was a grievous and deplorable exhibition of the brutish self-seeking that shows itself in all walks of life. Everywhere men are commended for pushing to the front. But it is opposed to the first principles of Christianity. Christ condemned it when he noticed how those who were bidden to the feast sought out the chief rooms, and the Apostle warns his readers:

"Where envy and strife are there is confusion and every evil work." (James 3:16.)

A Motorman's Warning.

The motorman of a surface car in Newark, N. J., was the means of saving several lives a few days ago. He was running one of the night cars on the Newark & South Orange line, and shortly after midnight was going through a densely populated street, when he stopped his car suddenly and jumped off. He had seen in a furniture store in the basement of a double tenement-house a great blaze shoot upward, and looking up, he saw smoke in great volume issuing from the roof. The house was evidently on fire, and the families on the four floors above the store were doubtless sleeping in profound ignorance of their danger. The motorman found the outer door open, as is usual in flat-houses. He went in, ran quickly up the stairs arousing every one by knocking at the doors and calling "Fire!" When he came down again, almost blinded with smoke, he ran to the nearest fire-alarm box and turned in a signal to the fire department. Then he returned to his car and resumed his journey. The occupants of the flat lost no time in groping their way out, and soon the whole building was wrapped in flame. It was feared for a time that some lives must have been lost, but, thanks to the motorman, all escaped. They were very grateful to him; they did not think him officious, or feel as people sometimes do toward Christians who warn them of their eternal danger; yet their peril was not so terrible as that to which the impenitent are exposed.

Knowing therefore the terror of the Lord we persuade men. (II. Cor. 5:11.)

Saved by Presence of Mind.

A remarkable escape from a perilous position is reported by a New Jersey journal. It appears that a mechanic was sent to Rahway, N. J., to make some repairs to the machinery in a music-box factory. He had finished his work and the machinery was started to see if it worked smoothly. Something was wrong with one of the bearings. It was a small matter that he thought could be easily fixed, and without stopping the machinery he mounted a ladder to put it right. When he was at work, with his back to the rapidly whirling shaft, his blouse was caught in it. He felt a mighty tug which dragged him from the ladder. It seemed for a moment as if his weight falling suddenly would release his blouse from the shaft, but only for a moment. The blouse held, and he was being drawn slowly but surely across the shaft and would have been mangled to death. But he realized what had occurred, and raising his arms to release the sleeves, he allowed the shaft to tear the blouse from his back and he fell to the floor, shaken but not otherwise injured. His presence of mind saved his life. If similar promptitude and decision of character were shown by men when they are assailed by temptation, they might save their souls. When some infatuation or propensity brings them under the power of the evil, they might generally escape if they were willing to cast it off immediately. It might cost them sorrow and pain, but they would hear the words the prophet spoke about the performance of another duty:

THE SHAH'S PALACE

"Thou hast delivered thy soul." (Ezek. 33:9.)

A Pardon Refused.

Among the reminiscences of prison life recently given by the warden of a famous prison to the reporter of a Philadelphia journal, is one of a prisoner who might have been pardoned, but refused the boon. He came of a good family and had served with distinction in the war, but afterwards he fell into dissipated ways, consorted with criminals, and soon became a criminal himself. He was arrested for burglary and was tried and convicted. After he had served two years of his sentence he was told that influential friends had interceded with the Governor on his behalf, and that a pardon would be issued if he would write a letter expressing contrition and promising to reform. The man took a day to think of it and then refused to write the letter. He said it was too late to reform. For many years he had associated with criminals, and was sure that he would not now be happy in respectable society. It would be useless to make good resolutions; he was sure to break them. Having become a criminal, he would remain a criminal, and preferred to finish his sentence and return to the society to which he had become accustomed. The man's frankness was a surprise, but he doubtless told the truth. He knew his own nature better than those people do who hope after a life of sin to repent in their last hours and be received into heaven. There is reason to believe that such changes are very rare. Of men who live in sin, as of men who live for God, it may generally be said, when this life ends, as it was said of the Apostles:

"Being let go, they went unto their own company." (Acts 4:23.)

BRIEF NOTES.

The General Assembly of the Southern Presbyterian Church has elected as Moderator Rev. R. Q. Mallard, D.D., of New Orleans. The Assembly's sessions were held at Memphis, Tenn.

Evangelist R. G. Pearson has been holding meetings at Gallatin, Tenn. Churches of four denominations united in the meetings and each has gained additions. Mrs. Pearson's Bible Readings were much blessed.

An English Statistician Computes that if Queen Victoria's subjects were averaged and classified according to religion, every group of eight would contain one Christian, two Mohammedans, and five heathen.

The Japanese Government has issued a proclamation in Formosa forbidding the opium trade, on the ground that Formosa must come under the same law as the rest of Japan. Provision will be made, by means of a government office, for the medical treatment of old habits.

Rev. Thomas B. Wood, D.D., Writing from Callao, Peru, to The Missionary Review, says: "Persecution, involving imprisonments, banishments, stoning of houses and persons, incendiarism, denial of natural and legal rights, are suffered constantly by the converts of our missions here, and they endure it with meekness and cheerfulness."

Mr. and Mrs. Norman Keyes, of Dr. Gordon's Missionary Training Institute are to sail in a few days for Natal, in East Africa, where they will labor under the auspices of the South Africa General Mission. Mr. and Mrs. Keyes are going out at their own cost, and the Mission is guaranteed all expenses of their maintenance for three years.

The National Christian Citizenship League asks again this year for a sermon on the duties of the Christian citizen from every pastor in the land and suggests that it should be preached on June 28 or July 5, as is most convenient to the preacher. Hints and suggestions helpful to preachers may be obtained by writing to the League, 153 La Salle street, Chicago.

According to the Statistics of the Baptist denomination, published by The Independent, the number of communicants is 3,720,285; there are 40,064 churches and 27,774 ordained ministers; the year's record of baptisms is 176,058, less than those of the preceding year by nearly 20,000. The total membership has also fallen off about 80,000. The number of Sunday Schools reported is 23,302, with 1,779,886 pupils.

Dr. Newman Hall, the Eminent London clergyman, celebrated his eightieth birthday on May 22. Dr. Hall is still active in the ministry and with his sons has received congratulations from clergymen and friends of all denominations on attaining his eightieth year, and among them many by cable from friends here. Dr. Hall is the author of "Come to Jesus," that useful book which has been blessed of God to the conversion of souls in many lands.

The Next Annual Meeting of the Niagara Bible Conference will be held July 8-14, 1896. As it will be a meeting of importance to all interested in its objects, a special request is made that all who have taken part in the meetings during the years past be in attendance this year. The announcement of topics and studies will be made in the annual circular soon to be issued. All inquiries may be addressed to the Secretary, W. J. Erdman, Germantown, Philadelphia, Pa.

Evangelist G. Emil Richter who has labored successfully in many churches on Long Island, and conducted a series of meetings at Mt. Sinai, L. I. some time since, is arranging for meetings in various parts of New England for the summer. Mr. Richter is cordially recommended by Rev. Charles Herald, Rev. E. A. Hazleton, Rev. Charles W. King and other pastors of Brooklyn and the neighborhood. Letters for him sent to this office will be forwarded to him.

The Christian Endeavor Convention in Washington, D. C., July 8-13, will be held in three large tents on the White Lot, an ellipse south of the Executive Mansion. A large number of churches have been engaged. It is possible that a number of churches will be engaged to send delegates to the convention, and rallying place of that State's delegation. Sunrise prayer-meetings are held each day in thirty-three churches, and these will be followed by Bible Readings from 7:30 to 9:30. Provisional programmes of the Convention may be obtained by sending stamps to Mr. John Willis Bass, 24 Washington St., Boston, Mass.

Loving Help for Mont-Lawn.

Poor Girls who were Once at our Children's Home now Work to Help Send others there—A Dressmaking Circle.

MONT-LAWN is now in full summer array. Within a few days, all the preparations for the reopening of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home for the season will be completed, and our first party of little guests will arrive on the steamer Chrystianah from the city. Soon the woodlands and the fields will echo with the merry laughter of the young folks, who never fail to thoroughly enjoy themselves during their ten days' outing.

Mindful of the fact that our Fresh-Air work at Mont-Lawn is a voluntary charity, many friends in different parts of the country have already shown a desire to share the burden of its support, and thereby add to the number of little waifs who will enjoy a sojourn there this year.

One very touching incident occurred lately, which illustrates the loving gratitude of the children who have shared the hospitality of the Home in the past. It is fully explained in the following letter from Miss Delaney, of the Catherine street Mission, in New York City:

"DEAR DR. KLOPSCH:—I take pleasure in sending you this accompanying package of clothing. It has been prepared for you by some little girls who went to the Children's Home two years ago. Some of them are now working, and, after their busy day in the store or factory, they are anxious to do something for dear Mont-Lawn; so they enlisted the sympathy of their shopmates, and, forming themselves into a little circle, have met at the home of one of their number—a tenement on a top floor in Cherry street. They asked me to come and see them and take charge of the garments which they had made; and they looked so bright and happy as they sat in groups, stitching away, that I asked their permission to have a photographer come in and take a picture of them for you.

"I have no doubt you will recognize most of the faces. 'Little One Thousand' and her sister are in the group, also the little girls who went up to the Bible House with their combined savings to give to you to help in keeping Mont-Lawn open for other children—Gertrude with the long curls, Katie and Pauline—you will remember them. They are working now. Pauline earns $2.75 and Katie $3.00 a week, so you see they could not do much, but I am sure you will not think the less of it for being only two mites—they have done what they could."

"In the rocking chair in the front of the picture, sits Gertrude's mother, at whose house they meet. I think the spirit of the founder must have entered into the little guests, and the desire to help others has been inhaled with the mountain air. When they started the work they said: 'Dr. Klopsch must require a lot of dresses, for he never lets a little girl come away from Mont-Lawn ragged.'"

"I have no doubt you will recognize most of the faces. 'Little One Thousand' and her sister are in the group, also the little girls who went up to the Bible House with their combined savings to give to you to help in keeping Mont-Lawn open for other children—Gertrude with the long curls, Katie and Pauline—you will remember them. came into our dispensary on Saturday last, who had not only never been to the country or the parks, but had never had a ride on a horse-car! 'Enlarge the place of your tent.'

"The accompanying ten-cent piece was brought to me by a little girl who was a guest at Mont-Lawn last summer. She had been hindered while there from going on a pleasure excursion of some kind with the other children, on account of having to care for her baby sister. To lighten her disappointment, you gave her this self-same ten-cent piece. She tied it up in the corner of her handkerchief and hoarded it till she came home. It was her very own, and nothing could tempt her to spend it. A few weeks later she walked from

The Sweet Sleep of Childhood.

Sleep, far more than the waking hours, is the period of growth in childhood. It is wise for us to make our children's sleep as sweet as possible. Give the dear little folks as little to worry over and to dream about as you can. Let your child always go to sleep with a glad thought in its heart and a smile on its face. The next morning, as it springs from its bed, the glad thought will burst out in songs, and the smiles in shout of laughter. If a wrong has to be reproved, let the child be assured of forgiveness and let the mother be assured that forgiveness is accepted before the eyes shall close. Let the child fall asleep loving all and assured of the love of all. Then, after the little prayer has been said, the child, at peace with all on earth and with the smile of heaven's love on its face, will drop away into peaceful slumber with its soul all untroubled and unsoiled, as white and smooth as a freshly washed and ironed piece of snow-white linen. It is a piece of downright Charles street where she lives (about a mile and a-half), bringing in her hand her treasured dime. She said, 'I want this to be sent to Dr. Klopsch to help for next summer.' While I know you are a firm believer in the return of 'bread cast on the waters,' you don't often see it so literally fulfilled."

We think much of our little friend's gift, and still more of the beautiful spirit that prompted it. "For of such is the kingdom." If other children who read this paper in their nice, cosy homes in town or country, and who love a summer romp in the fields, will give a moment's thought to the poor little boys and girls of the hot and sickly tenements, they will try to do at least as much as our young friend toward giving some little waif a holiday.

cruelty, one of the crimes which law cannot reach, for a thoughtless and fretful mother to scold her children away from her presence at night and to drive them to bed with sharp and angry words. Can anything be sadder to look upon than the face of a child, drawn even in sleep with the poignancy of its youthful sorrows and with the wells of its grief suffusing its eyelashes and gemming its cheek with crystal tears!

Home Safeguards.

Some of the principal safeguards of morality grow out of the social relations, says a thoughtful writer. Among these are the restraints of the family, of the state, of public opinion. In the family the life of each is so bound up with the life of others that there arises a sort of social conscience; what one would not hesitate to do if isolated from such ties, he finds to be no temptation, or at most a slight one, when he considers the welfare of those near to him. This is not conscious altruism, but rather the normal, almost involuntary habit of a social being. When he violates it we call him inhuman. The penalties of all civil governments have their place among the safeguards of morality

Where's Mother?

BURSTING in from school or pla This is what the children s Trooping, crowding, big and small, On the threshold, in the hall— Joining in the constant cry, Ever as the days go by, "Where's mother?"

From the weary bed of pain This same question comes again; From the boy with sparkling eyes Bearing home his earliest prize: From the bronzed and bearded son Perils past and honors won: "Where's mother?"

Burdened with a lonely task, One day we may vainly ask For the comfort of her face, For the rest of her embrace; Let us love her while we may, Well for us that we can say "Where's mother?"

Mother with untiring hands, At the post of duty stands, Patient, seeking not her own, Anxious for the good alone Of the children as they cry, Ever as the days go by, "Where's mother?"

Outdoor Work for Women

LADY HENRY SOMERSET contributes to a contemporary a very instructive letter on the subject "Outdoor Life for Women," in which she says: "If we are to do the work is crowding into women's hands these days, we must be studen the physical basis of life and character. Whoever chooses to ignore laws of God written in our men is flying in the face of unescap penalties. It is wonderful to see the fuller life of woman is ing almost without observation in new freedom granted her by p opinion to share all the harm healthful, open-air amusement her brother. There is nothing weighs upon our spirits more fitted to arouse more gloomy fore ings for the future of our cou than the stooping, narrow-che anæmic-looking girls who crowd offices, factories, and shops of all cities. An outing into the pure try air once a year has hitherto the summit of their hopes; but volution is being slowly wrought that will entirely change the as of life for working girls. The country with all its recreative cha will soon be at their doors. The plege hitherto belonging only to rich—a Saturday to Monday in country when the sultry air ma town intolerable—is fast becoming possible to them, and the new tr that brings with it these fresh ho is none other than the swift steel, the bicycle.

"In France its use is now clas among those pleasures within a charmed circle of 'good form,' most fashionable Parisian shops with each other in their display costumes that unite taste, hygi and convenience for feminine ti of the wheel, and we are all painfully aware that yesterday's fashions in P will be adopted in London and New Y to-morrow; for once, however, we come the 'mode' of the gay city, an hope we who live in the neighborhood our cities and large towns may, in practical fashion, turn the new dispensation to good account for working girls arranging to receive members of bicycl clubs either in some little cottage adjoin our own homes or by now and then inving a party of bicyclists to our gardens thus sharing with others the coun delights that we have too long enjoyed alone."

A Verse for Fault-finders.

Someone with a pretty thorough appreciation of the evils and vexations that arise from fault-finding, has embodied this verse a little moral which those who are apt to be captious and exacting should remember:

What are another's faults to me?
I've not a culture's bill
To pick at every flaw I see,
And make it wider still
It is enough for me to know
I've follies of my own,
And on myself that care bestow
And let my friends alone.

Doubts and Difficulties.

Questions on the Christian Endeavor for the Week Beginning June 21.
11m 40: 1-17.

EVEN of the eyewitnesses in the days of our risen Lord, the Evangelists have to say, "But some doubted." Man is so constituted that he is sure to doubt, and the more intelligent he is, the more likely he is to doubt. Even to God it was impossible to reveal himself fully to the human mind. The subject is so vast for us to comprehend. We know this and that about him, but we cannot by the effort of our mind, form a definite conception of him, or a complete and harmonious view of what he is. We do not understand his government of the world, nor his dealings with the individual soul. We see so much in life that is at cross-purposes, so much that seems like caprice, or indifference, on the part of the divine Ruler, that we cannot help doubting. Men prosper; evil-doing goes unpunished; the innocent are tempted; temptation seems almost omnipotent; good parents are evil-disposed children; rich, corrupt men thrive, while good men who would put away to a good use if they could, are thwarted and fail in what they undertake; the good man whose life is a blessing to his family and neighbors, falls sick and dies, while the bad man, who is a curse to all whom he comes in contact, lives on to old age—as we do at all these things, we wonder whether God really does what happens in this world, or whether if he cares, he is able to alter the course of events. It is only by faith that we obtain our confidence in his wisdom and love. We do not know his plan; it is impossible for us to know it; but we know enough of him to be sure that it is right and good. It is the attitude described by the Psalmist, in the passage associated with the topic, that resolves doubts and difficulties. Many a man has come out of the darkness by that path. The Psalmist says that he waited patiently for the Lord and was brought out of the miry clay and set upon a rock. There are some things for which we must wait, there are things which a child cannot understand until he grows to manhood; but as the child knows enough of his father to be convinced that he is loving and wise, so the Christian may rejoice in the same confidence. With his feet on that rock, the storms that beat about him cannot shake him and he may wisely refuse to venture on miry paths in which he may be hindered or hampered. The promise is given that he who doeth his will shall know the doctrine, and that promise is surely fulfilled. In the path of docile obedience, light comes. It is not the man who is humbly trying to do his duty and to impart to others the light that has come to him, who suffers most from the torment of doubt. God has the right to expect from us so much of confidence as will produce right conduct. It would be an undue on our part to demand the solution of all mysteries before rendering obedience, as would be for the child to require an explanation from his parents of their reasons for every command they may give. We know that he who honestly and humbly endeavors to live according to the lines hands clearly revealed in the Bible, will lead a useful and a noble life. Beyond, we may safely trust to the love and goodness of God, assured that in his good time the dark will be made light to us.

Faith's meanest deeds more favor bears,
Where hearts and wills are weighed,
Than brightest transports, choicest prayers,
Which bloom their hour and fade.

God's Love.

I KNOW where'er my feet may be,
Tho' prone to stray,—
His watchful eye is over me,
Both night and day.

And tho' oft-times this heart has erred,
'Mid worldly cares,
I know his pardoning ear has heard
My humble prayers.

At all times, e'en when I have failed
To do his will,
His love has in my heart prevailed,
And guides me still.

Jews in Palestine.

The Way being Prepared for the Predicted
Return of the Jews to their Own Land—
An American Traveler's Observations.

SOME notable facts of deep interest to students of prophecy are reported by Dr. Harvey B. Greene of Amherst, Mass., who returned last week from an extensive tour of several months duration in the Holy Land. Dr. Greene as our readers may remember, is the eminent botanist who made the collection of familiar flowers of the Bible from which were made up the Floral Albums issued by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Dr. Greene has been busy since the beginning of the year in and around Jerusalem, in Galilee and east of the Jordan searching for the flowers referred to by the Bible writers. His quest took him into all parts of Palestine and brought him into contact with the people who now live there in the villages identified with the lives of our Lord and the Patriarchs. He had consequently unusually good opportunities of learning the present condition and character of the people and comparing them with those he observed in them in his former visits.

One of the first matters forced upon his attention, was the prominence attained by Jews in the business of Jerusalem, Jaffa, (the ancient Joppa), and other towns. In some streets, notably in Jerusalem, nearly every store is in the hands of the Jews. Going out on the first morning after his arrival in Jerusalem to purchase implements, etc., for his work, he was surprised to find the principal stores closed. He could not understand the suspension of business at first, but looking up at the signs he recognized the Jewish names and remembered that it was Saturday, the Jewish Sabbath. Dr. Greene learned that there are fully forty thousand Jews in the city, which is double the number there were there fifteen years ago, and they are growing in numbers and influence. The number who went there at the time of the Exodus from Russia some ten or twelve years ago, was so large that the Sultan issued a special order forbidding any Jew of Russian birth to settle there. Those who had settled were not to be disturbed, but no more were to be admitted. Some, however, do gain admission still by the familiar method of backsheesh. With Jews of other nationalities there appears to be no difficulty. Dr. Greene was much interested in one colony managed by Jews. The property had been acquired by fifty families and five families have been sent forward to occupy the ground and prepare it for cultivation. The five families are supported by the other forty-five who furnish them with implements and materials. When they report that the colony is ready, the forty-five families will come out and take possession. The tendency, however, still is to settle in the cities, the Jew preferring trade as an occupation, to the tilling of the soil.

When we consider how many promises there are of the Jews being once more in the possession of their own land and the statement that they will be there when our Lord comes, these facts observed by Dr. Greene are very significant. The way is evidently being prepared for their return and the advance column is already in possession. To this must be added the suggestion of Holman Hunt, the famous artist, that the Jews should lease Palestine from the Sultan giving him guarantees of increased revenue—a proposal which Mr. Hunt says he would favorably consider.

"is a dear child," said Mr. Davis, "she has her mother's eyes."

Pauline in her blue-draped chamber, spoke her verdict to herself.

"They are all splendid, and I'm a good blunder of my relations than they can be a regular woodpecker among birds in paradise. I wish I hadn't to be so plain. 'Well, I'll ring true if I'm lovely, and character is more than any way.'"

She addressed slowly, her æsthetic eyes in all the dainty appointments of which was to be her very own.

She knelt by the broad, low, window and said her prayers, looking away to the soft summer sky, and then at hush of delight she lay down on the delicately perfumed sheets, and gave herself up to the enjoyment of the present which God had given her. She did not think of Sleepy hollow. She did not think of it by.

CHAPTER IV.

Problems of City Life.

She entered Pauline's room to find her travelling in the exquisite pathos of her "Snowbound," before dressing her. The problem of clothes had been solved by Aunt Rutha, in her pleasant way.

"You are just Belle's age, my dear," she said the day after Pauline's arrival, "I shifted a delicately pencilled muslin of large parcel which had been brought in White's, and laid it against her shining cheek."

"It is very becoming, don't you think, Gwen? It is such a delight for me to have two daughters to shop for. I've always had a craze to buy doubles of everything, but Gwendolyn was so tender, I could never indulge myself. There's no need to say anything dearie," she kissed away the remonstrance at the forming on Pauline's lips. "You tell us now, you know, and your father thinks he owes your mother more than can ever hope to repay." Then she led her to the lounge which Gwendolyn was piling high with suits of delicately colored and ruffled underwear.

"I did not know whether you would like sets to be of different patterns or not. Belle has such a horror of having things so alike that I ventured to think that these would agree."

"The girls are going in town to-morrow for their summer hats, so you can see the rest of your shopping then, if you like, and get an idea of our city."

When had followed a morning such as she had never dreamed of. The excitement driving to the station in the early morning air, past houses, which, like Uncle's, seemed the abodes of idyllic ease. Before many of them carriages were waiting and through the open doors caught glimpses of white-capped nurses and colored nurses carrying babies in robes of lawn and lace. A vision of play in her pink-checked gingham skirt before her. How could life be so different!

Inside in the cars was delightful, past discussion of elegant houses and beautiful laid out grounds, till she began to feel she had reached a new world where there was an unknown quantity.

The city with its delightful whirl of cars and horses and people. She had imagined there could be so many in one place before. She marvelled at the descension of the gentlemen in the finely appointed shoe-store, and as if as one of them lifted her foot on a stile. She looked in amazement at the richly furnished apartments of Madame and the wonderful structures of lace and ribbon, which the saleswoman assured them were worth thirty dollars, and was lost in a dazed delight, as, with the calmness of experienced shoppers, her cousins went from department to another in White's and Evey's laying in a supply of airy things of which she did not even know the use; always being treated by them with the same delicate consideration; there was nothing forced upon her, only, as they were getting things, she might as well be fitted, too. Then up past St. Paul's and the Common, and then home to a lunch of chicken salad and strawberries and frothed chocolate, in the cool dining-room, with its massive leather-covered chairs and potted plants and roses.

She was growing used now to the new order of things, and smiled a welcome to Belle from the velvet lounging chair in which she, Pauline Harding, who had never lounged in her life, was beginning to feel perfectly at home.

"What an inveterate bookworm you are Paul," and Belle looked at the pile of volumes Pauline had brought from the library, to study in the long morning hours which the force of a lifelong habit gave her before the rest of the family were astir.

"You forget I'm an ignoramus," she answered quietly. "I must do something to catch up."

Belle shrugged her shoulders.

"What's the use? It is surprising with what an infinitesimal moiety of knowledge one can get through this old world."

"Such a speech from a woman in this age is rank heresy!"

"Oh, of course, if you are going in for equal suffrage and anti-opium, &c., but I never aspired to the garment of either Lucy Stone or Frances Willard. I do pine to be an anatomist, and Professor Herchel says I have a decided talent for it, too. Last term we were on cats, dissecting them you know, and he said I took out the brain of my feline better than any of the rest of the class, for I never once cut into any of the twelve pairs of small nerves. It took me three hours to do it, but it paid for the trouble. However, papa is not progressive, at least he does not want his daughters to be, though I tell him I might be a Professor in Harvard some day, so there is nothing left for me but to fall into the ranks of the majority and do nothing."

"Why so? Is there nothing in the world but suffrage and opium, and—cats?"

"Oh, dear yes, there's philanthropy, but Gwen does that for the family. She is on every society under the sun. Let me count them if I can. There's the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, and the Society for the Improvement of the Moral Condition of Working Women, and the Society to Improve the Sanitary Condition of Tenement Houses; she's a member of the Y. W. C. A., and the W. C. T. U., and the Y. P. S. C. E.; she's on the Board of Lady Managers of the Newsboy's Home, and one of the Directors of the Industrial School for Girls; in fact, she is fairly torn asunder in her efforts to ameliorate the condition of the 'submerged tenth.'"

"Submerged," echoed Pauline wonderingly. "Is anyone submerged in Boston?"

"You dear stupid, of course! The unseen population in filth, rags, and unrighteousness, and the rest of us in lazy self-indulgence, which perhaps, in God's sight, is about as bad. I often think if each professing Christian took hold of one poor beggar and tried to elevate him, we would solve the problem a good deal sooner than by starting so many societies to improve them in the aggregate. I can theorize, you see, but the practice is beyond me."

"But why don't you try it?" cried Pauline, her eyes sparkling. "It's a splendid idea."

"Bless you, my child, because it would involve work, and that is a thing I abhor."

"But Gwendolyn must work on all these societies," said Pauline.

Belle danced across the room, and seated herself on the arm of her chair.

"You dear old thing! You're as innocent as your own daisies, and it's a shame to take you from your mossy bed. Don't you know there is work and work? God says, 'Go work in my vineyard,' and we good Christians answer, 'Yes, Lord, but let someone else go ahead and take out the stumps.' The most of us like to do our spiritual farming on a Western scale. It's pleasanter to drive a team of eight horses over cleared land, than to grub out thistles all alone in a corner."

SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS IN CONFERENCE.

The Great Triennial International Sunday School Convention to Assemble Next Week in Boston, Mass.—What it is expected to Accomplish.

MORE than a million and a quarter Sunday School teachers will be represented in the International Sunday School Convention, which assembles next week in Boston, Mass. Delegates to the number of 2,896 are expected, besides a host of persons who are interested in the Convention and its work. They will come from every State and Territory of the United States and from every Province of Canada, that has a local organization competent to elect delegates. The significance of such an assembly cannot be over-estimated. It implies an interest in Christian work and learning or increased efficiency in the service of our Lord, which speaks volumes for the vitality of the Church of Christ. It is also significant of the essential unity of Evangelical Christians. All denominations will be represented in the great assembly, and common purpose will animate the delegates. The one object all have in view is to devise plans for the extension of the Master's kingdom among the children and young people of our day, not to propagate any creed or "ism," nor to gain profit or distinction for themselves. How best to sow the Gospel seed in the soil that is more productive than any other, how to interest the rising generation in spiritual things, to so present Christ to their minds that they will love him and submit themselves to him—these are the problems to be considered by this army of earnest workers, coming together for mutual helpfulness in service.

The Convention will assemble on June 23, and it is proposed to hold three sessions in that and each of the three following days. Preliminary meetings for prayer and the arrangement of the programme will be held by the various Committees. There will also be special meetings in connection with the Primary Department and other special features of Sunday School work. The chief sessions will be held in the new Tremont Temple, the home of the church of which Dr. Lorimer is pastor, and which has lately been rebuilt. A picture of this famous building appears on this page. It is an ideal edifice for the purpose, with its large auditoriums, convenient Committee-rooms, and other facilities for the transaction of such business as the Convention has before it. Arrangements have also been made for a noon-meeting each day to be addressed by Mr. D. L. Moody, in Park Street Congregational Church, which is near at hand, and an overflow meeting in the evening will be held there if Tremont Temple proves inadequate to accommodate the audiences that may be gathered. Elaborate arrangements have been made by the Boston friends for the entertainment of the delegates. Lodging, breakfast, and supper will be furnished free of cost to all regularly elected delegates, who notify the Chairman of the Entertainment Committee of their appointment, and the restaurants and hotels in the neighborhood of Tremont Temple offer special considered and decided at the business sessions of the Convention. Among others will be the proposal to extend the field of operation to the West Indies, especially to Cuba. This proposal indicates the aggressive spirit of the workers, as it is a distinctively missionary field into which it has not heretofore entered. It is also proposed to largely develop the organization among the colored people of the South, and to appoint specially qualified superintendents to assist in establishing schools. The Convention will have to decide how far such work comes within its sphere, and whether it might not be more legitimately performed by the Sunday School Union, whose missionaries are a carefully selected in 1899 and that a special fund of an additional twelve or thirteen thousand dollars a year be solicited from individual subscribers to support and extend aggressive operations. The selection of a city for the 1899 Convention must also be made, and several officers are to be elected. Arrangements are also to be made for sending a delegation to the World's Sunday School Convention which is to be held in England next year.

Probably the most momentous of the duties the Convention will have to perform, however, is the appointment of a Committee to select the International Lessons. On March 13 of last year, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD published the portraits of the fifteen eminent scholars who form the present Committee. They were appointed in 1890, though some of them have served since the first Committee was organized in 1872. They have already selected the Lessons, it is understood, for next year and the year following, and will, prior to the assembling of the International Convention, choose the Lessons for 1899. This work has been done absolutely without compensation, their travelling expenses incurred in attending the meetings of the Committee alone being paid for them. Death made inroads on the Committee since its appointment, and several of its members now ask to be relieved from duty. There will, therefore, be several places to fill, even if, as is probable, many of the members be, as in former years, re-appointed. From several quarters the suggestion comes that the new members of the Committee shall be practical Sunday School teachers, who, having to explain and teach the Lessons to children, will know by experience the kind of Lessons that will be most useful. Such men, while respecting the instruction of the Convention to cover the entire Bible in the series of six years' Lessons, will be likely to avoid choosing Lessons on abstruse doctrines, and select such passages as are most easily applicable to the duties of modern life. Teachers in every land have reason to pray that the Convention be divinely guided in the appointment of this Committee, which will direct the studies of more than twenty million children in the Sunday Schools of the world.

The approaching Convention is the eighth of the International Conventions. Dr. Trumbull, who has written in the Sunday School Times an exhaustive history of these assemblies, claims that the great meeting which Nehemiah called in Jerusalem after the Captivity was practically a Convention of this kind, as the Bible was the theme of study "day by day from the first day until the last day" (Neh. 8: 18). The modern Convention so far as we know it, however, dates from 1832, when a National Convention of Sunday School teachers was held in New York, at which fourteen States and Territories were represented. This was followed by another the next rates for diners. An excellent musical committee has been at work for some time past arranging for the music of the Convention. Gospels 1 to 5, bound together, which many of our readers have as a premium of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, will be the book used, as being the one with which the majority of the delegates are most likely to be familiar. Many important questions will be considered and decided at the business sessions of the Convention. Among others will be the proposal to extend the field of operation to the West Indies, especially to Cuba. This proposal indicates the aggressive spirit of the workers, as it is a distinctively missionary field into which it has not heretofore entered. It is also proposed to largely develop the organization among the colored people of the South, and to appoint specially qualified superintendents to assist in establishing schools. The Convention will have to decide how far such work comes within its sphere, and whether it might not be more legitimately performed by the Sunday School Union, whose missionaries are a carefully selected

THE DESTINY OF NATIONS.

A Sermon Preached by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., at Washington, D. C., on the Text: Rev. 8: 10, 11, "There fell a great star from heaven, burning as it were a lamp, and it fell upon the third part of the rivers, and upon the fountains of waters; and the name of the star is called Wormwood."

MANY commentators, like Patrick and Lowth, Thomas Scott, Matthew Henry and Albert Barnes agree in saying that the star Wormwood, mentioned in Revelation, was Attila, King of the Huns. He was so called because he was brilliant as a star, and, like wormwood, he embittered everything he touched. We have studied the Star of Bethlehem, and the Morning Star of the Revelation, and the Star of Peace, but my present subject calls us to gaze at the star Wormwood, and my theme might be called Brilliant Bitterness.

A more extraordinary character history does not furnish than this man thus referred to, Attila, the King of the Huns. One day a wounded heifer came limping along through the fields, and a herdsman followed its bloody track on the grass to see where the heifer was wounded, and went on back further and further, until he came to a sword fast in the earth, the point downward, as though it had dropped from the heavens, and against the edges of this sword the heifer had been cut. The herdsman pulled up that sword and presented it to Attila. Attila said that sword must have dropped from the heavens from the grasp of the god Mars, and its being given to him meant that Attila should conquer and govern the whole earth. Other mighty men have been delighted at being called liberators, or the merciful, or the good, but Attila called himself, and demanded that others call him, the Scourge of God. At the head of 700,000 troops mounted on Cappadocian horses, he swept everything from the Adriatic to the Black Sea. He put his iron heel on Macedonia and Greece and Thrace. He made Milan and Pavia and Padua and Verona beg for mercy, which he bestowed not. The Byzantine castles, to meet his ruinous levy, put up at auction massive silver tables and vases of solid gold. A city captured by him, the inhabitants were brought out and put into three classes: the first class, those who could bear arms, who must immediately enlist under Attila or be butchered; the second class, the beautiful women, who were made captives to the Huns; the third class, the aged men and women, who were robbed of everything and let go back to the city to pay heavy tax.

It was a common saying that the grass never grew again where the hoof of Attila's horse had trod. His armies reddened the waters of the Seine and the Moselle and the Rhine with carnage, and fought on the Catalonian Plains the fiercest battle since the world began. 70,000 men died on the field! On and on, until all those who could not oppose him with arms lay dead. Then he turned back, and a bishop cried: "It is the aid of God!" and the people shouted: "It is the aid of God!" As the cloud of dust was blown aside the banners of re-enforcing armies meted to the victorious Attila, the Scourge of God. The most important resource, and after three months of failure to capture the city of Aquileia, and his army had given up the siege, the flight of a stork and her young from the tower of the city was taken by him as a sign that he was to capture the city, and his army, inspired by the same occurrence, resumed the siege, and took the walls at a point from which the stork had emerged. So brilliant was the conqueror in attire that his enemies could not look at him, but shaded their eyes or turned their heads.

Slain on the evening of his marriage by his bride, Ildico, who was hired for the assassination, his followers bewailed him not with tears, but with blood, cutting themselves with knives and lances. He was put into three coffins—the first of iron, the second of silver, and the third of gold. He was buried by night, and into his grave were poured the most valuable coin and precious stones, amounting to the wealth of a kingdom. The grave diggers and all those who assisted at the burial were massacred, so that it would never be known where so much wealth was entombed. The Roman Empire conquered the world, but Attila conquered the Roman Empire. He was right in calling himself a scourge, but instead of being the scourge of God, he was the scourge of hell. Because of his brilliance and bitterness the commentators were right in believing him to be the star Wormwood. As the regions he devastated were parts most opulent with fountains and streams and rivers, you see how graphic is this reference in Revelation: "There fell a great star from heaven, burning as it were a lamp, and it fell upon the third part of the rivers and upon the fountains of waters, and the name of the star is called Wormwood."

Have you ever thought how many embittered lives there are all about us, misanthropic, morbid, acrid, saturnine? The European plant from which wormwood is extracted, artemisia absinthium, is a perennial plant, and all the year round it is ready to exude its oil. And in many human lives there is a perennial distillation of acrid experiences. Yea, there are some whose whole work is to shed a baleful influence on others. There are Attilas of the home, or Attilas of the social circle, or Attilas of the Church, or Attilas of the State, and one-third of the waters of all the world, if not two-thirds the waters, are poisoned by the falling of the star Wormwood. It is not complimentary to human nature that most men, as soon as they get great power, become overbearing. The more power men have the better, if their power be used for good. The less power men have the better, if they use it for evil.

Birds circle round and round and round before they swoop upon that which they are aiming for. And if my discourse so far has been swinging round and round, this moment it drops straight on your heart and asks the question: Is your life a beautiful thing, or an embitterment, a poison, or a cure, a balm, or wormwood?

Some of you, I know, are morning stars, and you are making the dawning life of your children bright with anxious and ences, and you are beaming upon all the opening enterprises of philanthropic and Christian endeavor, and you are heralds of that day of Gospelization which will yet flood all the mountains and valleys of our sin-cursed earth. Hail, morning star! Keep on shining with encouragement and Christian hope!

Some of you are evening stars, and you are cheering the last days of old people; and though a cloud sometimes comes over you through the querulousness or unreasonableness of your old father and mother, it is only for a moment, and the star soon comes out clear again and is seen from all the balconies of the neighborhood. The old people will forgive your occasional shortcomings, for they themselves several times lost their patience when you were young, and slapped you when you did not deserve it. Hail, evening star! Hang on the darkening sky your diamond coronet.

But are any of you the star Wormwood? Do you scold and growl from the thrones paternal or maternal? Are your children everlastingly pecked at? Are you always crying "Hush!" to the merry voices and swift feet, and their laughter, which occasionally trickles through at wrong times, and is suppressed by them until they can hold it no longer, and all the barriers burst into unlimited guffaw and cackinnation, as in high weather the water has trickled through a slight opening in the mill-dam, but afterward makes wider and wider breach until it carries all before it with irresistible freshet? Do not be too much offended at the noise your children now make. It will be still enough when one of them is dead. Then you would give your right hand to hear one shout from their silent voices, or one step from the still foot. You will not any of you have to wait very long before your house is stiller than you want it. Alas, that there are so many homes not known to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children, where children are put on the limits, and whacked and cuffed and ear-pulled, and senselessly called to order, and answered sharp and suppressed, until it is a wonder that under such processes they do not all turn out Modocs and Nana Sahibs!

What is your influence upon the neighborhood, the town or the city of your residence? I will suppose that you are a star of wit. What kind of rays do you shoot forth? Do you use that splendid faculty to irradiate the world or to rattle it? I bless all the apostolic college of humorists. The man that makes me laugh is my benefactor. I do not thank anybody to make me cry? I can do that without any assistance. We all cry enough, and have enough to cry about. God bless all skillful punsters, all reparteeists, all propounders of ingenious conundrums, all those who mirthfully surprise us with unusual juxtaposition of words. Thomas Hood and Charles Lamb and Sidney Smith had a divine mission, and so have their successors in these times. They stir into the acid beverage of life the saccharine. They make the cup of earthly existence, which is sometimes stale, effervesce and bubble. They placate animosities. They foster longevity. They slay follies and absurdities which all the sermons of all the pulpits cannot reach.

They have for examples Elijah, who made fun of the Baalites when they called down fire and it did not come, suggesting that their heathen god had gone hunting, or was off on a journey, or was asleep, and nothing but vociferation could wake him, saying: "Cry aloud for he is a god; either he is talking or pursuing or peradventure he sleepeth and must be awaked." They have an example in Christ, who with healthful sarcasm showed up the lying, hypocritical Pharisees by suggesting that such perfect people like themselves needed no improvements, saying: "The whole need not a physician, but they that are sick."

But what use are you making of your wit? Is it besmirched with profanity and uncleanness? Do you employ it in amusement at physical defects for which the victims are not responsible? Are your powers of mimicry used to put religion in contempt? Is it a bunch of nettles, an invective? Is it a bolt of unjust scorn? Is it fun at other's misfortune? Is it at their disappointment and defeat? Is it bitterness put drop by drop into a glass? Is it like the squeezing of Artemisia sinthium into a draught already distastefully pungent? Then you are the Wormwood. Yours is the fun of a rattlesnake trying how well it can sting, the fun of a hawk trying how quickly it can strike out the eye of a dove.

But I will change this and suppose you are a star of Worldly Prosperity. You have large opportunity. You encourage that artist by buying his picture. You can improve the fields, the stables, the highway, by introducing your style of fowl, and horse, and cow, and sheep. You can bless the world with your pomological achievement in the orchard. You can advance arboriculture and agriculture. You can put a piece of sculpture into the niche of that public academy. You can endow a college. You can stock a thousand bare feet from the winter frost. You can build a church. You can put a missionary of Christ on that foreign shore. You can help ransom a world. A rich man with his heart right—can you tell me how many good a James Lenox or a George Peabody or a Peter Cooper or a William E. Dodge did while living, or is doing now that is dead? There is not a city, town, neighborhood that has not glorious specimens of consecrated wealth.

But suppose you grind the face of the poor. Suppose when a man's wages due you make him wait for them because he cannot help himself. Suppose that, because his family is sick and he has extra expenses, he should politely ask you to raise his wages for this year, and you roughly tell him if he wants a better place to go and get it. Suppose by your manner you act as though he were nothing and you were everything. Suppose you are selfish, and overbearing and arrogant. Your first name ought to be Attila, your last name Attila, because you are the star Wormwood, and you have embittered one-third, if not three-thirds, of the water that roll past your employees, and operatives, and dependents, and associates; at the long line of carriages which the undertaker orders for your funeral, in order to make the occasion respectable, will be filled with twice as many dry, tearless eyes as there are persons occupying them.

There is an erroneous idea abroad that there are only a few geniuses. There are millions of them; that is, men and women who have especial adaptation and quickness for some one thing. It may be great, it may be small. The circle may be like the circumference of the earth, or no larger than a thimble. There are thousands of geniuses, and in some of them you are a star. What kind of star are you? You will be in this world but a few minutes. As compared with eternity the stay of the longest life on earth is not more than a minute. What are we doing with that minute? Are we embittering the domestic or social or political fountains, or are we like Moses, who when the Israelites in the Wilderness complained that the waters of Lake Marah were bitter and they could not drink them, cut off the branch of a certain tree and threw that branch into the water, and it became sweet and slaked the thirst of the suffering host? Are we with a branch of the Tree of Life sweetening all the brackish fountains that we can touch?

Dear Lord, send us all out on that mission. All around us embittered lives—embittered by persecution, embittered by hypercriticism, embittered by poverty, embittered by pain, embittered by injustice, embittered by sin. Why not go forth and sweeten them by smile, by inspiring words, by benefactions, by hearty coun-by prayer, by Gospelized behavior! Let us remember that if we are wormwood to others we are wormwood to ourselves, and our life will be bitter and our eternity bitterer. The Gospel of Jesus Christ is the only sweetening power that is sufficient. I have heard people asked in social company: "If you could have three wishes gratified, what would your three wishes be?" If I could have three wishes met this morning I tell you what they would be. First: more of the grace of God. Second: More of the grace of God. Third: More of the grace of God. In the dooryard of my brother John, missionary in Amoy, China, there was a tree called the emperor-tree, the two characteristics of which are that it always grows higher than its surroundings, and its leaves take the form of a crown. If this emperor-tree be planted by a rose-bush, it grows a little higher than the bush, and spreads above it a crown. If it be planted by the side of another tree, it grows a little higher than that tree and spreads above it a crown. Would God that this religion of Christ, a more wonderful emperor-tree, might overshadow all your lives! Oh, more of the saccharine in our lives and less of the wormwood!

What is true of individuals is true of nations. God sets them up to revolve as stars, but they may fall wormwood.

Tyre—the atmosphere of the desert, fragrant with spices, coming in caravans to our fairs; all seas cleft into foam by the sails of her laden merchantmen; her markets rich with horses and camels from Tadmah, her bazaars filled with upholstery from Dedan, with emerald and coral and amethyst from Syria, with wines from Helbon, with embroidered work from Ashur and Hamad. Where now the gleam of her towers, where the roar of her chariots, where the masts of her ships? Let the fishermen who dry their nets where once she stood, let the barbarians who set their tents where once her palaces glittered, answer the question. She was a star, but her own sin turned to wormwood and she is fallen.

Babylon, with her 250 towers and her brazen gates and her embattled walls, the splendor of the earth gathered within her palaces, her hanging gardens built by Nebuchadnezzar to please his bride, Amytis, who had been brought up in a mountainous country and could not endure the flat country round Babylon—these hanging gardens built, terrace above terrace, till at the height of 400 feet there were woods waving and fountains playing, the verdure, the foliage, the glory looking as if a mountain were on the wing. On the tip of a king walking with his queen, among statues snowy white, looking up at birds wrought from distant lands, and drinking out of tankards of solid gold or looking off over rivers and lakes upon nations subdued and tributary, crying: "Is not this great Babylon which I have built?"

What battering-ram smote the walls? What army shattered the brazen gates? What long, fierce blast of storm put out its light which illumined the world? What crash of discord drove down the music that poured from palace window and garden grove and called the banquet-dancers to their revel and the dancers to their feet? I walk upon the scene of desolation to find an answer and pick up pieces of vitru-men and brick and broken pottery, the remains of Babylon, and as in the silence of the night I hear the surging of that billow of desolation which rolls over the scene, I hear the wild waves saying: "Babylon was proud. Babylon was impure. Babylon was a star, but by sin she turned to wormwood and has fallen."

From the persecutions of the Pilgrim Fathers and the Huguenots in other lands, God set upon these shores a nation. The council fires of the aborigines went out in the greater light of a free government. The sound of the warwhoop was exchanged for the thousand wheels of enterprise and progress. The mild winters, the fruitful summers, the healthful skies charmed from other lands a race of hardy men who loved God and wanted to be free. Before the woodman's axe forests fell and rose again into ships' masts and churches' pillars. Cities on the banks of lakes began to rival cities by the sea. The land quakes with the rush of the rail-car and the waters are churned white with the steamer's wheel. Fabulous bushels of Western wheat meet on the way fabulous tons of Eastern coal. Furs from the North pass on the rivers fruits from the South. And trading in the same market is Maine lumberman and South Carolina rice merchant and Ohio farmer and Alaska fur dealer. And churches and schools and asylums scatter light and love, and mercy, and salvation upon 60,000,000 of people.

I pray that our nation may not copy the crimes of the nations that have perished, and our cup of blessing turn to wormwood, and like them we go down. I am by nature and by grace an optimist, and I expect that this country will continue to advance until Christ shall come again. But be not deceived! Our only safety is in righteousness toward God and justice toward man. If we forget the goodness of the Lord to this land, and break his Sabbaths, and improve not by the dire disasters that have again and again come to us as a nation, and we learn saving lesson neither from civil war nor raging epidemic, nor drought, nor mildew, nor scourge of locust and grasshopper, nor cyclone, nor earthquake; if the political corruption which has poisoned the fountains of public virtue and beslimed the high places of authority, making free government at times a hissing and a by-word in all the earth; if the drunkenness and licentiousness that stagger and blaspheme in the streets of our great cities as though they were reaching after the fame of a Corinth and a Sodom are not repented of, we will yet see the smoke of our nation's ruin; the pillars of our national and state capitals will fall more disastrously than when Samson pulled down Dagon; and future historians will record upon the page bedewed with generous tears the story that the free nation of the West arose in splendor which made the world stare. It had magnificent possibilities. It forgot God. It hated justice. It hugged its crime. It halted on its high march. It reeled under the blow of calamity. It fell. And as it was going down, all the despotisms of earth from the top of bloody thrones began to shout, "Aha, so would we have it," while struggling and oppressed people looked out from dungeon bars with tears and groans and cries of untold agony, the scorn of those and the woe of these uniting in the exclamation, "Look yonder! there fell a great star from heaven, burning as it were a lamp, and it fell upon the third part of the rivers and upon the fountains of waters; and the name of the star is called Wormwood!"

year in Philadelphia, after which there was a long interval of twenty-six years. In 1855-57 there was a movement for State organization, and in 1859 the third National Convention was held in Philadelphia. The outbreak of the war caused another interval, and it was not until 1868 that the fourth Convention was held. In 1872 the fifth National Convention was held at Indianapolis, Ind., and it was at this time that the International Lesson system was adopted. Canada was invited to co-operate, and the next Convention which was held at Baltimore, Md., in 1875 became the First International Convention. Since that time they have been held regularly every three years. At Atlanta, in 1878; Toronto, 1881; Louisville, 1884; Chicago, 1887; Pittsburg, 1890; St. Louis, 1893.

On this and on the first page, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gives the portraits of five of the most prominent leaders of the approaching Convention. Mr. B. F. Jacobs is chairman of the World's Sunday School Convention and also chairman of the Executive Committee of the International Convention. He has been prominent in Sunday School work and superintendent of a Sunday School in Chicago for forty years. Mr. Jacobs was one of the earliest and most energetic advocates of the International Lesson system and has been a member of every one of the Lesson Committees appointed since the system was adopted. Dr. H. Clay Trumbull, the editor of the "Sunday School Times" which has done more than any other journal to aid the teacher in his work, has been active in these Conventions for nearly forty years. He was secretary of the National Convention of 1859 and of that of 1867 and was chairman of the Executive Committee of the first International Convention in 1875. Dr. Warren Randolph is secretary of the International Lesson Committee, a position he has held since the first committee was organized in 1872. His devotion to the work is extraordinary. During the twenty-four years, he has been absent from the meetings only once and then only through the occurrence of a blizzard which interrupted his journey. His duties have involved his traveling over thirty thousand miles. Mr. W. N. "Ole Aunt Charity's Lam'."

SOMETIME ago, a white tramp was found one morning lying in an open field, just outside of the corporate limits of Danville, very sick. His case was reported to the authorities and the city physician went to see him; he pronounced the case small-pox, and had it removed to a house standing by itself. As several persons were known to have been exposed, a general alarm was manifested. Every precaution possible was taken by the authorities to prevent the spread of the dreaded disease; the public schools, and the public generally, were vaccinated.

During the height of the scare, I was sent for to see a sick man; he dwelt in the poorer portion of the town, and lived a rather dissolute life. When I arrived at the place he called home, I found him entirely alone, all his friends having forsaken him under the impression that he had small-pox. It was a case of facial erysipelas. Such a case needed close nursing and constant care. I knew not what to do with him. Everybody was afraid of the small-pox. The colored people have no use for what they call "poor white trash;" his craven friends had deserted him. There was at that time no hospital in the city. It was impossible to stay personally or to give attention other than a daily visit. While I was trying to decide what to do, the door was darkened. Looking up I saw an old colored woman whom I knew; she greeted me with:

"I dun' hured 'burt dis yer man's triflin' frins, an how dey dun' lef' him. Dese yere pore white trash ain't no 'count nohow. Ise cum to nurs him and take keer of him, he ain't fitin' to die, nohow."

"But, Auntie, have you ever had the small-pox?"

"No, I'se mitey skeered, I is; but dis yere po' man don' lay here an die fur want of nursin', kase if he die, de Marse up yonder gwine say to Ole Charity, wen I gits up dar, 'Charity, wat you let my pore lam' suffer fur? How cum' you don' go nurs him, wen he was sick dun yonder, an' tun to him like de good S'mariten, I dun tole you all about in de good Book?' Wat I gwine tell my Marse 'bout dat?"

An expression touched her homely old face that made it almost radiant, as she said this, at the same time taking off her hat and hanging it up with the air of one who had come to stay. Wishing to test her still further, I said to her:

"But, Auntie, this man is not able to pay you a cent; he will have to be fed by charity while he is sick."

"Bress you chile, de Lord dun' tole me to cum, an' he gwine take keer of Ole Charity; I don want no pay, nohow. Now, masse doctor, you do all you kin, an' tole me wat you want dun, an' I gwine do it; 'pears to me like he gwine go way from here mitey soon 'cept we do sumfin'."

The good old soul had taken me into partnership at once, and getting some warm water, she proceeded to give to the poor fellow what he had not indulged in for sometime—a good washing. Leaving some simple instructions as to his care, diet, and medicine, I left her feeling sure that "our patient" would receive good care by such a noble, self-sacrificing spirit.

I related the incident to a few of my friends, and they took care that Aunt Charity and her protegee had every comfort, and that she was recompensed for the two weeks that she remained faithfully at her self-appointed task. She has since gone to "Ole Marse up yonder," and could we all feel as certain of as bright a welcome as I believe awaited simple, faithful, trustful "Ole Aunt Charity."

Review of the Quarter.

Sunday School Lesson for June 28. Golden Text, Luke 24: 47. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OUR Golden Text: "That repentance and remission of sins should be preached in His—Christ's—name among all nations, beginning at Jerusalem" agrees exactly with the teaching of the great supper, with which the series of lessons for the past quarter commenced. Repentance and remission of sins separate us forever from our past, if the repentance is a real leaving of all we are and all we have; a complete abdication of the throne of our being in favor of him who is our rightful King.

But, O, how many there are, who, like the prodigal son, cherish a sense of what is due to them; and live a self-centred life. All their ideas of justice are formed by what they consider to be their rights, and the general tone of their prayers is on the same line: "Give me the portion of goods which falleth to me." (Luke 15: 12). And too often their history resembles that of the children of Israel and of the prodigal son: "He gave them their request; but sent leanness into their soul" (Ps. 106: 15). He gave the prodigal his portion, but it was soon wasted, and the leanness of his soul made him turn his thoughts to the home and to the father which he had despised. And then only could he appreciate the mighty love of a father's heart which claimed the returning prodigal as a cherished son, and overwhelmed him with the acknowledgment of that relationship which the humbled son had not dared to claim.

This lesson in our series brought us to the rich man and Lazarus; and a still deeper lesson of the corruption of the life of self was brought before us. Here is a man who has never disgraced either his father or himself, by "riotous living." He has done simply what most rich men do: indulged himself by ministering to his every wish, in food, in clothing, in all which money could procure. Probably a great majority of those people who are in a similar position might consider it a great impertinence to find fault with their manner of life. They discover, when it is too late, that they have awfully miscalculated: in their life time they have received their good things. Some poor Lazarus, who carried no purse for want of money to put into it, who owned neither house nor land, nor anything on earth, but who had made use of his life on earth to form a deep acquaintance with the living God, had secured rights and privileges incorruptible and unchangeable, in that after life where the rich man could have no part.

Our next lesson was on Faith; and we learned that in this, also, we are to serve God, and not to expect him to serve us. Instead of a man who is to be served, we are to be a man who serves. The things which we have ready, although those mountains lie just as they are, the things: the forgiving of a brother who appears to lay himself out to provoke us on purpose, and who says, "I repent," while his actions give the lie to his words.

In the same line of putting God first, we had lessons on prayer. The widow with her plea to the unrighteous judge, strongly contrasted with him who day and night hears his own elect; the Pharisee so filled with himself, that he never perceived that God was not present to hear him; the Publican, broken down with the sense of his unworthiness, just because he had really met with God; the little children warmly welcomed by him who for their sakes had also become a little Child; all striking, as much as in the former lessons, at the root of that self-life which is the rival and enemy of God within us.

In our lessons on the Parable of the Pounds and the Destruction of Jerusalem foretold, we were led to see our immense responsibility in view of the ting of living through dying, of ascending through descending, of reaching the highest by first taking the lowest places. And that, not by effort, but the very power of in-dwelling God, "Christ in you the hope of glory." (Col. 1: 26.)

In our lesson on the risen Christ, we saw how the Christ before his ascension, left us as his most precious gifts, his Word and his Spirit, a complete outfit for the supernatural life to which he has called us, until he shall come. And we have seen how the very life of God within us is begotten by the Word and by the Spirit of God, and the absolute necessity we have to let the Scriptures sink down into our ears. (Luke 9: 44).

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

THE twelve lessons of the quarter were concerned with the events and teachings of the last four months of Christ's life which were spent partly in Perea and partly in Jerusalem. Luke devotes nearly half his Gospel to that period, as if he considered it the most important and representative part of Christ's ministry. Probably, Christ, knowing that the end was near at hand, compressed and epitomized the teaching of the blessed expectation—the coming of our Lord. Whatsoever may be the pound committed to us, in the family, in the workshop, in the office, in the parish, in the work of God, etc., the Lord Jesus appeals to us, "Occupy till I come" (Luke 19: 13), and shows us that our whole life, with all its attendant circumstances, is arranged in view of the coming of our Lord.

The lesson following was a Warning to the disciples. Again it was the self-life, a strife among them which should be accounted the greatest, and that at the very moment of the institution of the Lord's Supper. And he whose spirit was the exact contrast to theirs bore with them, and in the tenderest love explained to them the secret of divine greatness, which takes the lowest place, and within less than twenty-four hours, he sealed his teaching by the Cross. previous three years, during that time, that the apostles, who were soon to be left without his guidance, might have a clear view of his principles. Each of the twelve lessons has its own special message. Six of them were on parables, four on Christ's discourses, and the other two on the story of his crucifixion and resurrection. The parables were: The Great Supper, showing how men might become so engrossed with worldly affairs as to neglect a great privilege; The Prodigal Son, a vivid picture of God's welcome to the penitent; Dives and Lazarus, teaching the duty of unselfishness and active philanthropy; The Pharisee and the Publican, indicating the attitude in which men should approach God; The Pounds, by which Christ intimated the principles of the final reward of service; and The Vineyard, a reminder of God's claims on the life and the danger of rejecting them. The four lessons occupied with direct teaching were on: The Warning against Sin, including the reminder that mere social and ecclesiastical connection with Christ, only is not sufficient for salvation without a change of nature; Faith, showing its power and mode of operation; the discourse on Greatness, with its lesson of service and humility; and the warning of the approaching National Calamities. The last two lessons on the Crucifixion and Resurrection appropriately close the series.

I fear they have me excited. (Luke 14:

18.) It is well known that the majority of Christians were converted in the youth. Few are converted after reaching the age of thirty, fewer still after forty, and it is a very exceptional thing to have an old man converted. The reason is that the longer a man lives without God, the more firmly the world fetters him. Thain Davidson, visiting a prosperous business man whom he had known in his youth, asked him, "When are you going to begin to prepare for eternity?" His reply was one that ought to be a warning to every youth. He said, "I know I ought to begin now, I have postponed it, I want to attend to it, but my mind is so full of business that I can think of nothing else."

I am not as other men. (Luke 18: 11.) The familiar story of the penitent convict, an illustration of the publican's attitude. In the reign of Louis XVI., a distinguished foreign visitor passing through France visited the galleys at Toulon. The commandant of the fortress was authorized as a compliment to the illustrious guest set free any convict whom he might select. The prince wishing to make a good use of his privilege, talked with several, and eventually assured him that he was innocent of the crime for which he had been sent to that place of punishment. At last, the prince came to one who admitted his guilt. He said his lot was hard but it was not as bad as he deserved. He had led a wicked life and the punishment had been merciful. This was the man whose release the prince asked for. He could respect such a man and could have faith in his future, as could not in the future of the men who professed innocence while they were guilty.

Faithful in a very little. (Luke 19: 17.) God does not require impossibilities of any one. He expects that we shall all be able with the powers and opportunities we have. A young minister was lamenting to the venerable John Brown of Haddington that his church and congregation were so small. "Are you sure, asked the aged minister, "that is a good thing to have many hearers? It is a terrible thing to be responsible for the enlightenment of one soul. You have many hearers every time you preach as you will care to answer for at the judgment." A boy or a girl who is filling well the place he is in, however humble it may be, is pleasing God better than is some one in a higher place who is failing to occupy it. Opportunity and responsibility are joined indissolubly.

Watch ye therefore and pray always. (Luke 21: 36.) An American tourist writes: "I went down to Southampton when I was in England to see the regiments land which had been fighting in Egypt. The normal strength of each regiment was about a thousand men. It was sad to see some regiments, of which only one or two hundred soldiers remained. There was one regiment that was nearly full, and I asked my companion, an English officer, how it was that it had escaped. He replied, 'I think I know. Its colonel is a very careful and vigilant man. He has a habit when he sees that the enemy is preparing to fire a deadly volley, of ordering his men to fall to their knees, and many a time he has saved his regiment in that way. The deadly hail passed harmlessly over their heads.' Christians may escape the shafts of temptation in the same way. They are not overcome if they take to their knees in the hour of peril."

Father, forgive them. (Luke 23: 34.) An officer accompanied by an orderly was going over a battlefield on which were many dead and dying. A wounded man lying on the ground beckoned to him, and as he approached begged for water. The officer saw from his uniform that the man belonged to the enemy, but he was a man, and in distress, and that was sufficient to entitle him to compassion. He bade his orderly get some water for him. As the officer bent over him, the wounded man treacherously leveled a pistol at him and fired. Providentially, the bullet missed its mark, but it was so near that it lodged in his cap. "Shall I shoot him?" the orderly asked. "No," said the officer, "give him the water all the same."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A Moslem Pageant.

ONE of the most gorgeous spectacles of the Mohammedan year has just taken place in Cairo, the ancient capital of Egypt. This is the procession of the Mahmal, which occurs before the starting of the great pilgrimage to Mecca, the birthplace of Mohammed. The Mahmal is simply a large, square, wooden frame, with a canopy top covered with red cloth richly embroidered with gold. It represents the litter used in her pilgrimages by Fatimah Shegeret-ed-Door, a famous princess, who in 1250 caused herself to be proclaimed Queen of Egypt. It is six centuries since the queen's pilgrimages ended, but they are still celebrated by the carrying of the litter in which they are said to have been performed, to Mecca and back every year. At the appointed time, the Mahmal is brought with great pomp to the public square. Strong detachments of cavalry and infantry head the procession. Then come the dervishes, some of them bearing richly emblazoned banners, some beating little drums, and some waving censers of incense. In solemn state, and with demonstrations of reverence, the Mahmal is borne through the streets to the Bab-en-Nasr, where it becomes a conspicuous object in the great procession which is started for Mecca. Another treasured article carried by the pilgrims is the veil, or carapace, for covering the sacred stone. This is of black silk, on which are embroidered in gold, texts from the Koran. Every year a new covering is solemnly carried to Mecca, and into the famous enclosure called the Kaaba, at the north-east corner of which the sacred stone is placed. It is almost black with the kisses imprinted upon it by millions of Moslem pilgrims who come from all lands to touch it with their lips. It is a small stone, an irregular oval shape, and about seven inches in diameter. The many fabulous stories told about it suggest the opinion that it is an aërolite. Some devotees, however, insist that it came from heaven with Adam, that it was miraculously preserved in the Flood, and was afterward given by the angel Gabriel to Abraham, to form part of the Kaaba. The stone is without doubt of great antiquity. It was revered in the time of Mohammed, who in 605 rebuilt the Kaaba, and placed the stone in it with his own hands. In 1627, the building was destroyed by a flood, but in the following year it was again rebuilt, and the sacred stone replaced. A band of silver a foot wide now surrounds the stone, and every year a new veil is bought and put over the exposed surface on the outside of the Kaaba. This done, the procession returns to Cairo bearing the Mahmal and the old silk covering. The return is the occasion of another pageant, and the veil which has done duty for a year is then cut up and distributed among the mosques. To enlightened people it seems childish thus to reverence the Mahmal, the Sacred Stone, and the cloth that has covered the stone, but people who deprecate such puerilities sometimes need to be reminded that there are other ways in which the idolatrous spirit may show itself. The Apostle says (Col. 3: 5), that covetousness is idolatry. There is reason to fear that of some in Christian lands it is still said:

Their idols are silver and gold. (Ps. 115: 4.)

rees that Escape Lightning.

A collection of statistics as to the trees that are struck by lightning has been made by Dr. D. Jonesco, the results of which he sends to a scientific journal. He finds that certain kinds of trees are more liable than others to suffer from an electrical discharge. In a dense forest where trees of various kinds grow near together, the lightning will strike a particular one and leave the others unscathed. Among the sufferers the most frequent is the oak, while the tree most seldom struck is the laurel. The professor has arrived at the conclusion from his study, that the more oil a tree contains the more it is protected from lightning. The laurel contains much oil while the oak has scarcely any. The rule holds, the professor says, in every case he has investigated. In every group of trees in which one has been blasted, he has found that the injured tree contained less oil than any other member of the group. It is not explained why the electric fluid avoids trees impregnated with oil, but doubtless a scientific reason will be found. A spiritual counterpart of the phenomenon however, is easily understood. When Sa-head, one with a fire engine, and another with a fire hat and trumpets made for firemen, and there are various other special scarf-pins. The demand for these articles has now fallen off, while the sale of society pins is increasing, more and more men preferring the society to the trade pin. Of emblem pins in general far more than ever before are now sold. They are worn by the members of various military, benevolent, veteran, trade, and social organizations, and by college societies. It would appear that men are now more desirous of marking their social than their trade affiliations; but the time is coming when neither the one nor the other will be so important to them as the question whether they belong to Christ:

I determined not to know anything among you save Jesus Christ and him crucified. (1 Cor. 2: 2.)

A Rescuer's Death.

A lamentable fatality occurred at an Elevated Railroad station in New York recently. The man who watches the ticket-whose salvation Christ laid down his life, that he might deliver them from evil, often hear unmoved the story of his sacrifice, and remain in their sins.

Despise thou the riches of his goodness . . . not knowing that the goodness of God leadeth thee to repentance? (Rom. 2: 4.)

The Effect of a Lily.

At a recent teacher's convention in Detroit, Mich., says a young people's journal, a teacher related a significant incident. She was in a school where nearly all the children came from the slums. She one day brought into school a beautiful calla lily. Of course the children gathered around the pure flower in great delight. One of them was a little girl, a waif of the streets, who had no care bestowed upon her, as was evinced by the dusty, ragged condition she was always in. Not only was her clothing dreadfully soiled, but her face and hands seemed totally unacquainted with soap and water. As this little one drew near the lovely flower, she suddenly turned and ran away down the stairs and out of the building. In a few minutes she returned with her hands washed perfectly clean, and pushed her way to the flower, where she stood and admired it with intense satisfaction. It would seem that when the child saw the lily in its white purity, she suddenly realized that she was not fit to come into its atmosphere, and the little thing fled away to make herself suitable for such companionship. Ministers and Christian workers have often witnessed a still more radical change when wicked men have come to realize the goodness and purity of the Saviour.

What carefulness it wrought in you; yea, what clearing of yourselves. (11 Cor. 7: 11.)

A Peril of the Sea.

The pilot-chart of the Hydrographic Office in Washington, issued recently, contains the warning that no less than eight abandoned and water-logged vessels are drifting in the steamship lanes of the Atlantic. One of them, which has a cargo of mahogany on board, and is level with the water's edge, has been drifting about for several months. The perils of collision at sea have been reduced since the steamship companies adopted what is known as the lane routes. Now, the route a steamer follows after leaving this port is fifty miles away from the route taken by steamers bound west. One steamer, therefore, is little likely to meet another and come into collision with her. But these abandoned ships, not being under control and carrying no lights are a continual source of danger. The government is doing a service by publishing the periodical notice to captains of the probable position of the derelicts. It would do a still better service by destroying them, as was suggested in Congress recently. The human derelicts, of whom there are so many drifting in society, are much to be dreaded, for "one sinner destroyeth much good," but in their case it is not their destruction that is desired, but that they may be rescued and through Christ brought into the haven of God's forgiveness, and a reward is promised to all who engage in that work.

Let him know, that he which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins. (Jas. 5: 20.)

A Fortune for a Bottle.

A problem for inventors is described in an article published by the Literary Digest. It says: "A large fortune awaits the ingenious person who shall invent a bottle or receptacle that cannot be emptied of its contents without breaking it or otherwise incapacitating it from being used again, thus preventing the use of copyrighted receptacles, at second-hand, for imitation products. Hundreds of such bottles have been patented, but none fill the requirements." The need for such a bottle is caused by the fact that purchasers are apt to conclude that the contents of a bottle are genuine, if the bottle bears a certain label or is of a certain shape. They often accept religious teaching in the same way. Thus a preacher belonging to an orthodox church may do more harm if he preaches error than one may do who is not so accredited. But even he could do little harm if the hearers would follow the example of the Bereans which the Apostle commended:

These were more noble than those in Thessalonica in that they . . . searched the Scriptures daily whether these things were so. (Acts 17: 11.)

tan's shafts are hurled against the Church in the shape of false doctrine, worldliness, or temptation in any form, those who fall are always they who have least of the oil of the Holy Spirit in their hearts.

But the anointing which ye have received of him abideth in you . . . and ye shall abide in him. (1 John 2: 27.)

Emblem Pins.

An article in a journal connected with the jewelry trade, calls attention to a change in the public taste as to the wearing of emblematic designs. Formerly, it says, there was a demand for scarf-pins and charms indicative of the wearer's business. Druggists would buy pins bearing a miniature mortar and pestle; a butcher, one with a cleaver; a printer, one with a composing-stick; a musician, one with a lyre. For tanners, there is a pin with a pair of shears for a head; for saddlers, a pin with a head in the form of a knife. There is a pin with a plane for a head for carpenters; a locomotive pin for locomotive engineers; a lantern for trainmen, and a ticket-punch for conductors. There are pins, one with a hook and ladder for a box on a station at 135th Street and Eighth Avenue saw a passenger ejected from a train on its arrival at his platform. He was at no loss to understand why he had been put off when he saw him staggering about the platform. The man was intoxicated. He had evidently intended to board the next train that came along, but he was standing so near the edge of the platform and was swaying so unsteadily, that he was in danger of falling over. The ticket-chopper, concerned for the man's safety, went to him and tried to draw him to the back of the platform; but the drunken man resisted and became abusive. In the struggle that ensued, both fell over on to the track, and a train coming at that moment, passed over them. The drunkard escaped with the loss of an arm, but his would-be preserver was instantly and horribly killed. One would hope that the drunkard would feel remorse, when he recovered his sober senses, and learned that a man had died in the attempt to save him from death. He must surely renounce the habit which had led to so deplorable a result. So much we would expect of him, yet we cannot be certain. Sinners for Building a Church by Prayer.

The Result of One Man's Zealous Desire to Win Souls for Christ.

IN the rural suburb of Sunnyside, near Long Island City, N. Y., a church is now in process of erection which when completed, will have a singular history. It is being built, stone by stone, brick by brick, and timber upon timber, by a little band of earnest men and women, who have resolved that with God's help the edifice they are rearing shall be free from the incubus of debt. With their own hands, the men and lads of the congregation dug the foundation and laid the stones for the building to rest upon. This new church, had its origin in the Christian zeal of one godly man, who inspired others with enthusiasm for the work.

In the winter of 1892-93, Mr. Claus Olandt, Jr., of Brooklyn, came to make his home in Long Island City. Soon thereafter, seeing the spiritual need of the Sunnyside district, he began a canvass among his friends with a view to establishing an evangelical church there. Mr. Walter E. Frew, Rev. J. W. Geyer, of New York, and Rev. Lewis Francis, of Brooklyn, entered heartily into the project. A committee was formed, money was contributed by friends, and, mainly through the unflagging energy of Mr. Olandt, sufficient means were gathered to enable them to begin work. There is no Protestant evangelical plan of worship in the neighborhood, the only church being a Roman Catholic one at Blissville. Saloons are more than plentiful. There are 2500 inhabitants, composed almost entirely of the artisan or working class. It is a mission field with a crying need for organized Christian effort.

In February, 1895, a few ladies under the leadership of Mrs. Olandt, organized a Ladies' Aid Society to assist in raising funds for the new enterprise. At present there are forty-six members, and $263 have been handed to the treasurer of the building fund from this source. Besides, several contributions have been given toward current expenses. In the latter part of June, 1895, a Sunday School was opened with twenty-nine scholars and a few teachers, in a room 14 x 46 ft., as temporary quarters. During September and October, Mr. Olandt and Mr. Otto, of Brooklyn, took charge of the morning and evening services. Since Sunday, November 10th, Daniel P. Doyle, of the Mt. Hermon School, has had charge of the Sunday School and the preaching services. The furniture used by a former mission, which was abandoned, was kindly loaned by the Third M. E. Church. A friend placed an organ at the service of the Mission. Notwithstanding disadvantages of location, the work has had a steady and encouraging growth. There are in the school 112 scholars and ten teachers.

Preaching services are held Sunday morning and evening, and during the week a prayer-meeting and a teachers' meeting. At the start, there were only one or two who could lead in prayer and testify; now there are about twenty-five who can do so. One man, who was formerly a drunkard, has been redeemed but Christians have taken to the study of the Bible under the faithful leadership of Mr. Doyle, and are working for the salvation of their friends and neighbors.

During last winter, an elderly dissipated man, much given to profanity, came into the services and was converted. A month ago he returned to his home, and the first time in the prayer-meeting. He prayed in German, and but few could understand him. One man said afterward: "I could not understand you, brother, but I caught the spirit." This man's testimony and prayers are fervent and earnest. So it is with many others.

"The excavation," said Mr. Olandt, "was done in part on Thanksgiving Day, by the neighbors and friends, representing different sects and beliefs, who came with shovels, picks, horses, and carts. Some of the ladies prepared lunch, and in the evening the men went home to have their dinner with their families. The remainder was done by contract for $45. The evening before Thanksgiving Day, a religious meeting was held in my residence, adjoining the lots, and then the friends repaired to the grounds, where five friends each paid $5 for the privilege of digging some earth and taking it home. After a few words, a prayer, and a hymn, the company dispersed."

The two lots cost $700, and the excavating, breaking stone, and building the walls for a roomy basement cost $740, making the expenditure to date $1440. The cornerstone was laid Sunday, May 31, with appropriate ceremonies. The building will be occupied as soon as the walls are up and enclosed and roofed. So far $2248.51 have been pledged, of which $1486 have been paid. $2400 will be required to put the building under roof with doors and windows, and $1200 more to finish and plainly furnish. The basement will be fitted up and furnished as occasion demands and as funds are secured. The audience-room will be forty feet by forty-eight feet, with a seating capacity of three hundred. The architect made plans and specifications gratuitously; one friend gave ten iron pillars, another a neat pulpit, another a fine illustrated pulpit Bible, and still another has promised an additional five feet by a hundred of land on the south side of the building to insure air and light. A friend gave the corner-stone, and another promised brick for the chimney. Thus encouraged the projectors of the work are trusting in God and believe he will help them up, lift up Jesus and bring in many souls.

Mr. Olandt, who is a native of Brooklyn, of North German parentage, is a physician by profession. He was one of the founders of the German branch of the New York Y. M. C. A., and was attached to the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A. During the last ten years, as an agent of the International Committee, he has been instrumental in raising large amounts of money in the United States and Canada for Christian work. Through his personal efforts many wandering souls have been led to the Saviour. Mr. Olandt, who lives at Sunnyside, L. I., will reply to any inquiries for information respecting the new church now in process of building under such peculiar circumstances.

Work of Freedom Begun.

The Philafrican Liberator's League Organized and now Ready to Enroll Members.

W HEN Heli Chatelain, on December 15, 1895, for the first time made public his plans for the Philafrican Liberator's League, in a paper read before the African Congress, at Atlanta, Ga., Bishop I. W. Joyce stepped forward to submit the following resolution, which was adopted unanimously by a rising vote: "Resolved, that we, as a Congress assembled to discuss and consider the interests and welfare of Africa, do hereby express our sympathy with our brother, Heli Chatelain, in his great purpose and work, and wish him every possible success in his noble and humane as well as Christly mission; and as we have means we will co-operate with him."

Writing to Mr. Chatelain, in April, 1896, Miss Frances E. Willard thus pledged the co-operation of the World's W. C. T. U.: "The white-ribbon women are a unit in favor of your work, and will co-operate in it to the extent of their ability. My whole heart is with you in this sacred cause to which I have been devoted from my earliest recollection. I learned to read out of 'The Slave's Friend,' and have earnestly ed missionary in Africa, his eminence a linguist, his success in mastering African languages and reducing them to writing grammatical form, and his thorough acquaintance with the climate and geograph of the regions in which he proposes to begin his renewed labors in the Dark Continent. That he himself is to lead the actual Christianizing and civilizing enterprise which he has planned, is certain greatly in favor of its practical success. May God bless him and all those who may co-operate with him in the attempt to combat the slave-trade in Africa."

For the purpose of completing the organization of the League a representative gathering of friends of the movement was held at the Y. M. C. A. parlors in New York City recently. Ex-Chief Justice Chas. Daly, Paul B. Du Chaillu, Louis Klopsch, Rev. Drs. J. Elmendorf, L. T. Chamberlain, W. H. P. Faunce, Lyman Abbott, Theo. L. Cuyler, Dr. Josiah Strong, and others attended. The meeting elected a Committee on Constitution and an Executive Committee, and adjourned on June 3.

On this date, the meeting adopted the Constitution submitted by the Committee and elected the following Board of Directors, with powers to choose the officers: The League, complete the organization, and direct all the affairs of the League in conformity with its Constitution: Ex-Judge Chas. P. Daly, Rev. Josiah Strong, Rev. L. T. Chamberlain, Dr. Louis Klopsch, D. Willis James, A. A. Low, Anson Phelps Stokes, Rev. David J. Bushnell, Cleveland H. Dodge, Rev. David H. Greer, D. T. B. Welsh, Rev. W. H. P. Faunce, W. J. Schieffelin, Frederick J. Conder, and Bishop Potter.

The Constitution is being printed. It will be forwarded to the members and to any address sent to Heli Chatelain, 511 United Charities Building, New York.

A number of able young men and women—physicians, ministers, teachers, farmers, and mechanics—have already applied for work in Africa. Mr. Chatelain and his chosen band of assistants are ready to sail at short notice. It is proposed by the new organization to push the work vigorously by the enrollment of members of the League and the reception of contributions for its operations. All contributions sent to this office will be duly acknowledged.

Woman's Lot in India.

A sad picture of home life in India as it affects women and girls was given at a recent meeting by Rev. J. G. Hawker, a Belgian missionary, who has been working in the neighborhood of Calcutta. He said no words were too strong to depict the degraded position and ignorance of millions of Indian women. Their condition came not as the result of accident, but through injunctions having religious authority, which forbid their being taught to read or write. Seventy-six years ago there were no girls' schools in India; now, consequent upon missionary enterprise, about three-quarters of a million of women and girls are able to read, or are learning to do so. But then about a hundred and twenty-eight millions of women and girls are at this day ignorant of their letters. The girls in the schools are positively fascinated by the Gospel history; the character of Christ, so glorious, pure, and true, now occupies in their hearts the place that was formerly held by the legends of vicious and impure divinities.

MOSCOW'S JOY AND SORROW.

The Czar's Coronation Festivities Shadowed by the Great Disaster at the Khodynski Plain—A Calamity that Saddened a Whole Nation.

THE KHODYNSKI PLAIN, MOSCOW, WHERE 3600 PEOPLE WERE CRUSHED TO DEATH.

A RUSSIAN PEASANT.

THE month of May, 1896, will be recalled in the coming years by the people of Russia with feelings of the deepest sadness. What promised to be one of the most joyful episodes of the nation's history, was transformed, almost in a moment, into an appalling tragedy, that made the nation's heart momentarily stand still.

Moscow was en fete; the ancient city was gay as it had been in a century. From the most distant parts of the Czar's dominions the loyal thousands came to attend the coronation ceremonies; from St. Petersburg, Nizni-Novgorod, Koslov, Odessa; from the shores of the Baltic and the Black Sea; from distant Asia and Mongolia; from Tartary, Siberia, and the confines of China, a strange and picturesque medley of races. Never had Moscow seen such enormous crowds, such enthusiastic loyalty, such brilliantly decorated streets, arches, pavilions, fountains, and churches; such masses of gaudy uniforms, or multitude of equipages, and such lavish display of wealth. At the Kremlin, the coronation ceremonies were ended, and the round of festivities in which the nobles of the empire were to participate, had begun. On the great stretch of level meadow known as the Khodynski Plain, temporary structures had been erected, as at former coronations, and here was to be the scene of the popular merry-making in which the townspeople, the moujiks, and the countless hordes of visitors were to take part. There were theatres and circuses on the edge of the Plain, some with a seating capacity of many thousands. Besides, there were to be games on the Plain in which the people should enter and compete for tempting prizes. Free food and drink were to be distributed by the Czar's servants. These and similar inducements combined to draw to the Plain the greatest crowd Moscow had ever witnessed—denser and more compact even than that which led the streets to observe the coronation pageant.

Very early on the morning of May 30, the people began to assemble in the Khodynski Plain. It was soon apparent that the police were not there in sufficient numbers to control the crowds. It was a working holiday, and the artisans of Moscow filled the mass of sightseers in front of the booths. Soon there were signs of serious trouble, and women and children began to scream in agony and terror, as they were caught in the deadly embrace of the huge crowds, from which escape was impossible. Shrieks and cries rent the air, and hundreds sunk out of sight, being dragged to earth by the twisting, writhing, wedge-like mass of human beings which trampled their bodies out of recognition. At the very beginning of the trouble, it was said, a number of the Czar's servants, without intending to do so, helped to make the disaster far more serious than it would otherwise have been. They were distributing free gifts of bread and drink, and the crowds, in their intense eagerness to secure the gifts, pressed forward fiercely, the tens of thousands behind forcing those in front against the barriers with such violence that the distributors were frightened and committed the fatal blunder of trying to quiet the mob by throwing a quantity of gifts among them. They even tossed among them hundreds of memorial goblets filled with mead, a sweet, intoxicating drink of which Russian moujiks are inordinately fond. These acts added fuel to the excitement and intensified the panic. The ground was made slippery by the spilled liquor and many fell there from that cause and were trampled to death. The earth was literally ploughed up by the heavy wooden shoes of the peasants. At the very height of the confusion, when half a million people were pushing, and swaying, and shrieking, while they cursed and prayed in the same breath, an attempt was made to separate the compact mass, whose condition was every moment becoming more appalling, but it was in vain.

The few scores who were wrenched from the struggling mob had their clothing torn to rags. In the swaying crowd the faces of dead men and women could be seen, as the senseless bodies were pushed hither and thither. People were falling everywhere, their breath crushed out. Some were bleeding, others, viz: clothing, boots, canes and umbrellas. In all, 3,600 lives were crushed out and nearly 4,000 persons were injured, many of them mortally. Of the dead, nearly a third were unidentified. Long trenches were dug and there the victims were interred with scant ceremony, each bearing on his or her breast an "icon," or sacred image, placed there by the priests of the national Russian Church. Moscow's coffin supply was exhausted and many were buried uncoffined. Among the dead were many women and numbers of little children. The scene at the rude burial of the victims is thus described by an eye-witness:

"Some of the men were giants in stature; some were mere youths. The scene at the burial ground was really appalling. The dead were laid in long rows, and hundreds of moujiks were working as though for life, excavating huge trenches in the soil, extending nearly the entire length of the churchyard. Hundreds were buried during the night, but next day the hillside was still covered with rough coffins. Everywhere stood groups from which came the low wailing chant which the Russian peasants sing over the dead. In one spot stood a big watering cart. Male and female dead were being washed by their relatives there in the open field. Around a long table sat a score of clerks writing orders for coffins. Hundreds of bodies, however, were unrecognized and were placed side by side in trenches."

Owing to the great number of the injured, there was not sufficient accommodation at the city hospitals, and hundreds of the injured were taken to the Voganoffsky Cemetery, where physicians and surgeons were soon busy among them. Doctors were brought long distances from other cities. Meanwhile, distressed relatives, hearing of the disaster, poured in from all quarters to search for missing friends. Many of the scenes were pitiful in the extreme.

Such a calamity naturally arrested the festivities, yet it was only a momentary interruption. Soon Moscow's sorrow was lost sight of in the resumption of the round of gayeties. But on thousands of peasant homes, the cloud of grief lay heavily. Among the moujiks the feeling against the Moscow authorities was intense, as they blamed them for the disaster, which might have been averted with proper precautions. The Chief of Police, mortified by the catastrophe, attempted suicide when its real extent became known. Emperor Nicholas has generously promised to aid the bereaved and will give to each family that has lost a member a thousand roubles, the state besides bearing all expenses of burial.

England's Oldest Methodist.

A lady, named Webster, who is believed to be the oldest female Methodist in England, is mentioned in the British papers. She is one hundred and seven years old and in possession of all her mental faculties. She has been seventy years a widow; has a daughter seventy-seven, a son seventy, and a grandson sixty years old. She has fifty-two great-grandchildren. She is a Methodist and regularly attended public worship up to her hundredth year. Two of her uncles died aged one hundred and four and one hundred and two.

Our Pioneer Sunday Schools.

How they are Hailed by the Children themselves—A Kansas Experience.

THE object of the planting of new Sunday Schools, writes Rev. George W. Sharp, our Missionary in the Southwest, "is the diffusion of Scripture knowledge among the children with a view to their eternal salvation."

This is aptly illustrated by the following letter from Missionary Frank Kizer:

"Good morning! Say, Our Sunday School has stopped. Can't you come and see us again?" Such was the greeting to me as I passed a group of children on the road the other day as I was on my way to a Sunday School Convention. With dinner-pail in hand they were trudging to school and, from former associations they knew me. The Sunday School in their district had been started like so many other schools by the missionaries in neighborhoods where they had but little interest.

Every Sabbath the school-house would be crowded with children, and only a few old people would be present to take charge of things. At last they became discouraged and the school died.

The missionaries' visit from house to house, telling the story of the little ones asking for the school, made the older ones ashamed of themselves, and at a public meeting old vows were renewed, and again the little ones had the school they all loved so well.

In one of these schools, I came in just as they were considering the proposition to close for the winter, when one of the boys said, loud enough to be heard all over the house, "Now he has come, I bet you we won't stop."

It is a great thing to have the confidence of the little ones, and have them trust you, and look to you as an example. I often pray to God for help as I come before so many of them night after night. I remember I was holding a meeting one time to organize a school, and I could get no one to take hold of the work, until one of the little girls whispered loud enough for all to hear, "I think that they all ought to be ashamed of themselves, don't you?" That little remark set them all to laughing, and a good school was the result. A meeting in one of our schools was in progress one night, and a little girl heard the minister talk about "black hearts." As she was going home with her father, she looked up in his face with, "Papa, is your heart black?" The arrow went to his soul as he evaded the question, but the next night he was converted.

So I might relate many incidents, where the little ones have stood up for Christ and the Sunday School. But here are many who do not have these schools, and to these we missionaries are sent that they may be induced to start. We need more such men for the work.

FRANK KIZER, A. S. S. U. Missionary.

Mr. Sharp writes from Kirksville, Mo., as follows:

"I have lately organized four schools and have others in prospect, and am greatly gratified at the number of calls I am receiving for missionary labor." Those of our readers who are interested in Mr. Sharp's missionary work among the children of the Southwest, can aid it by sending their contributions for that purpose to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

with white faces, vainly fighting for life, and still others battling with one another.

After what seemed hours, although it was really only a short time, the panic ceased, and the wedged-in crowd broke apart and scattered. Then were seen the terrible effects of the crush. The Khodynski Plain was strewn with the dead and littered with the evidences of wreckage,

Among them were letters from Turkey showing the great stimulation is about the shrine, but the Arabic work was an increasing demand for the Bible, owing to an increasing interest in religion from Rev. QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

M. H. M. 1. Do we have to send in our names for enrollment as patrons of the B. W. M. Mission? 2. What is the address of the Mission?

By no means. Anyone is at liberty to send requests for prayer. 2. 105 Bowery, New York, but requests for prayer should be sent to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

W. W. Slocum, Indianapolis, Ind.; Geo. W. Trenton, N. J.; E. A. C., Germantown, Pa.; Aged Reader, Sufferns, N. Y.; Contributor, Brooklyn, N. Y., and several others. We have already mentioned, in previous issues, F. D. Greene's famous book on the Armenian massacres, entitled: The Rule of the Turk. This is undoubtedly the most complete presentation of those terrible atrocities, that have been published, and is copiously illustrated from original photographs. We can supply the volume to our readers at 25 cents per copy, postage prepaid; but as the edition is nearly exhausted, it will be necessary for those who wish copies to act promptly. The price in price from 50 cents to 25 cents, made with the view of putting this valuable and accurate source of information on the greatest crime of the age within the reach of the poorest. The outrages perpetrated upon the Armenian Christians by the Moslems under the Sultan's orders, form a part of history which every one possessing a spark of human feeling should be conversant.

Sandreczky, of the Children's Hospital, Jerusalem, writes:

"I have blessed and prospered our work during the last year. From all parts of the world gifts have been sent us. We began this year under very favorable circumstances. We long to have a building of our own for the work."

M. C. J. M., Otav, Cal. In the Lord's Prayer, which is correct to say: "Our Father who art," or "Our Father which art;" also the other terms, "in art," or "on earth," "them" or "those who pass against us?"

While the modern correct English is preferred by the cultured ear and sense, at the same time the ancient form of the sacred petition has been preserved, because the whole Christian world is loath to modernize it. We might change it, in its present form, to some grateful inscription that has been cut into rock or marble, and to deface or alter which would be vandalism. So the Lord's Prayer in its venerable form is graven upon the hearts of souls of men, and they would not have it altered, preferring to retain it with all the peculiarities of the early Saxon translation which has stood through so many generations.

Per. Sodus, N. Y. 1. Is it sensible to continue attending Sabbath School when the superintendent never speaks to or recognizes us by even so much as a nod of his head? Would it not be better to stay at home? 2. Of what use are cancelled postage stamps, and why do some people collect them by the hundreds, and what can they use them for?

What you mention implies a strange lack of courtesy and an undervaluing of the affectionate respect that should be felt by Sabbath school teachers or superintendent. It may be that your superintendent is an extremely modest and sensitive man, who finds it painful to make acquaintances. We do not think you would be justified in leaving the school, however, on that ground. 2. Collections of rare foreign or domestic stamps have a distinct market value, but the ordinary current stamps are valueless, save for decorative purposes.

W. H. Keator, Polo, Ill. I want to be a medical missionary, but have no money, or rather very little, and I must depend entirely upon my own resources for an education. If I take but a three years' course in a medical college, I cannot finish before five years. Will I then be too old, being twenty-three this summer? If I take but a three years' course will I be fitted for my vocation, or for such work ought I to take a four years' medical course? Would it be better to take some special training in a Biblical Institute either before or after the medical course, or ought I to get into the field as soon as possible?

Do not go out to the missionary field unprepared. An extra year or two spent in training will make your work much more valuable and effective, when once begun. Write to the Bible Institute, Chicago, for special training, and to Dr. George R. Dowkontt, 18 E. 45th St., New York, regarding the medical studies, which must be taken last.

L. Shee, Statenville, Springs, N. Y. 1. Why is it said that "Talk is cheap," while the Saviour says that for every idle word we must give account? 2. Why was not Absalom put in the place called "Absalom's Place," that he reared to keep his name in remembrance, because he had no son to keep it? 3. Why does not this or some other government stop the terrible outrages the Turks are perpetrating among the Armenians? 4. Why are there some women, even among us, who are slaves to their husbands, as much as we say: "You are here to wait upon me?"

The first is merely a sarcasm to show the ease with which a promise is made, compared to the difficulty of performance. The latter is a Divine saying that applies to all human conduct, and especially to the folly of trivial conversation. There can be no comparison. 2. Josephus, the famous Jewish historian in Ant. chap. 10, § 3, states that Absalom had three sons and one daughter. The passage in II Sam. 18: 18, may mean that they were dead when the chronicle was written, or before the death of Absalom himself. No explanation can be furnished to the first part of the question. 3. Because they have been recreant to their duties as professedly Christian governments, otherwise the whole civilized world, acting unitedly through official representatives, could have put a stop to the atrocities long ago. 4. There is no accounting for the brutality of human nature, even among so-called civilized peoples. It is a pity that there is not a law to reach domestic bullies. Only the grace of God working in the heart can effect a change in such natures.

Armenia still comes in for a very large share of the sympathy of our readers, whom the following letter will doubtless interest:

My plan to help the Armenian Christians, is as follows: I advocate emigration to America—to Georgia, especially—of able-bodied, deserving men, women and children. Lands are cheap, and labor scarce in the rural districts. Middle and southern Georgia is fine agricultural country, not developed, and the climate especially adapted to people who cannot surround themselves with all the comforts of life. The suffering of this class would be materially less on this account. To make a thorough canvass of the well-to-do honorable and best farmers, asking them how many families and persons each could take, selecting homes only from such men as are able to care for the number agreed upon. This would be no special hardship for the average Southern planter, as he now is taking care of the negroes year in year in advance. The cry would go up, "What will become of the negro?" Allow me to say, under any and all circumstances he will be taken care of in the South. The negro is a consumer more than a producer, and what Georgia wants now is a class of thrifty working-people, who know some lessons in economy, thrift, and industry, and who, under favorable circumstances can reach the point of self-support.

LARNAKA, THE CHIEF COMMERCIAL CITY OF CYPRUS.

This plan could be put in operation in a very short time with no outlay of money save transportation. It is my opinion that 1,000 families could find homes by October 1st, 1896. A ship-load could be landed at Savannah, and undoubtedly the railroad companies could be prevailed upon to forward these people to their new homes free. The furnishing of homes to this Christian people under existing circumstances, would be sowing Christian seed broadcast over this beautiful South-land, and the example would undoubtedly be followed in the near future by other States.

I have talked to several prominent farmers in this locality, and each and every one has agreed to take from two to five families, and I can promise you now within a radius of fifty miles, to find homes—and such homes as the true Georgians only have—for fifty families. Will pledge themselves to furnish labor, food, and homes for them for one year from date of arrival. P. B. WATKINS, Darien, Ga.

M. H. A., Brooklyn, N. Y. 1. What authority have we to use the word "Sunday" in the Bible, any more than David's which are in the Bible, any more than we would take a text from a god man's word—not inspired? 2. What authority have we to use the name Sunday, for the Lord's Day? The word Sunday is not in the Bible, and I have always been taught to say Sabbath, and that the heathen worshipped the sun and called the day Sunday. Why should we call the Lord's Day Sunday, instead of Sabbath—the name given in the Bible for the Lord's Day?

1. We have the example of the apostles and early fathers of the Christian Church, who evidently were accustomed to the use of other psalms in worship, as well as those of David. In writing to the Ephesians (5: 19), Paul advises them to speak to themselves "in psalms and hymns and spiritual songs." Besides, the earliest genius of the Church was employed in the writing of just such spiritual songs, some of which are even yet used on occasion. See also Col. 3: 16. 2. The word Sunday, it is true, does not appear in the Bible, but this may be explained by the fact that when the New Testament was written, there were many features relating to church ordinances and nomenclature not arranged. These were settled afterward, and in arranging the feasts and festivals of the early Christian Church, it was endeavored, as far as expedient, to have them fixed on the same dates as the old heathen festivals, which they were designed to, and afterward did, supersede. In some instances, traces of the ancient appellation remains, as in the case of Easter, which derives its name from the heathen goddess, Ostera, whose feast was formerly held at a date equivalent to our Eastertide. All the days of the week were originally named after heathen deities—Woden, Thor, Freya, Saturn, the Sun, the Moon, etc. The Sabbath was the original Jewish appellation for the seventh day—our Saturday—and is still so applied by orthodox Hebrews. With Christians, it would now seem to be a matter of personal preference which is used, although it is beyond question that in the earlier days of the Church, the expression, "Lord's Day," was almost universally employed when referring to the Christian Sabbath. On Scriptural grounds, it is doubtless correct.

Miss Emma Wright, Cripple Creek, Col., writes:

At the time our terrible fires occurred, our church, together with three others, was burned. The members were scattered and the church was left in ruins, but we are now rebuilding. We trust in the Lord. With his assistance we expect to rebuild, and do good work in this wicked city.

C. B. Winegan, Lebanon, Kan., writes concerning Mr. Frank Kiser's recent letter on sod houses:

This section of Kansas will compare favorably with most of the states. Most of our farmers have comfortable frame or stone houses, and good barns and other outbuildings. Ten years ago, sod houses and dugouts were quite numerous, but now, in a long day's drive, the chances are that not one will be seen. The country is dotted over every few miles with good frame school-houses, modern furnished, and where no church house is near, Sunday School and church services are held in the school-houses. There may be, and very likely are, isolated cases where a family is too poor to buy suitable clothing for church-going, but this is the case in all sections.

E. A. Vail, City Missionary and manager of the Union Gospel Mission, New Orleans, writes:

Check to hand. Many thanks to the kind readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD FOR THEIR CONTRIBUTIONS.

his people. It could not appropriately be used by anyone else. In that sense, therefore, it is the Lord's prayer, though the one in Matthew is the one most frequently designated by that name, and not improperly, as our Lord was the author of it.

M. D. Everest, Kan. Is a person who is a member of the Protestant Episcopal Church justified in uniting with a Methodist Episcopal Church if that is the only church within reach?

Certainly, or with any other Christian church if it happened that no other was convenient. A Christian of any denomination has not learned the spirit of Christ if he has not learned to recognize as a brother any man who loves his Lord. You will find that you have more in common with the Methodists than you are aware of, and we should be surprised to learn that you did not derive profit from your membership with them. Their mode of worship may not please the taste of one accustomed to a liturgical service, but the sincerity and earnestness of the prayers will compensate for any lack of elegant language there may be.

X. Y. Z., Baltimore, Md. Is it conclusive evidence that a young man has not been converted, that he is troubled with impure thoughts?

Certainly it is not evidence. Every man has some avenue by which temptation most easily besets him. His duty is to exercise special vigilance at that avenue. He should study himself and find out how best to deal with the temptation. In your own case you will do well to ascertain by recalling your periods of trial, what were the exciting causes, and avoid them in future. Plenty of hard work, physical and mental, the pursuit of some absorbing subject of study, constant occupation, the avoidance of reverie, and of suggestive books, a careful attention to diet, and, above all, earnest prayer, especially whenever the impure thoughts arise, are the means you should use. We have no doubt of your being cured by them. But you must be continually on your guard against sudden temptation. The passages of Scripture you quote need not worry you. You have to fight your battle, and it will be a hard one, but you may count on divine help, and if you are really in earnest, you will win the victory. You must act intelligently, as you would if you were afflicted with some physical disease and were seeking a cure. Thousands of young men have fought the same battle and have won it. Do not doubt your conversion. That would undermine your strength.

"Anxious Wife," Topeka, Kans. My husband is a Baptist and I a Methodist. We agreed when we were married that we would go to our respective churches; but he is anxious about my salvation. He thinks that I cannot be saved without being immersed. Would it be a sin to do as he wishes, I having been baptized in infancy?

By no means. There can be no sin in it, and as it is likely to promote domestic harmony it is a thing to be commended. It can do no harm and it will satisfy his scruples, and probably relieve him of some anxiety on your account. Several well-known and conscientious Christians, not belonging to the Baptist church, have been immersed recently, having reached the conclusion that immersion was the true mode of baptism. Anyone coming to that conclusion does well to act upon it. The fact of their having been baptized in infancy need not be a bar to a second baptism.

L. C. T., Vesper, Ia. 1. Where in the New Testament is the command to keep the first day of the week as the Sabbath? 2. Why was the day changed?

1. There is no command recorded, and probably none was given. 2. In celebration of Christ's rising from the dead. At the first great council of the Church, when the question was discussed whether the Gentile converts should be required to obey the Jewish law, it was decided that only four observances should be required of them. (See Acts 15.) The observance of the Jewish Sabbath was not one of the four, and the Gentile Christians do not appear to have ever kept it. The Rabbis had made it ridiculous by a host of absurd regulations about what a man might, or might not, do on that day. Christ was frequently accused of breaking the Sabbath. The Jewish observance was most vexatious and onerous, and the Apostles very wisely did not attempt to bring the Gentiles under the bondage. The writings of the early Fathers show that very early in the Christian era, if not in Apostolic times, the first day of the week was uniformly the day of religious meeting and abstinence from secular labor, thus celebrating the new Creation as the Jewish Sabbath celebrated the old. Several incidental allusions in the Acts show that even in Apostolic times the custom was prevalent. But we do not observe Sunday as the Sabbath. It is seldom a day of rest to the earnest Christian, but of holy activity in his Master's service. He calls it the Lord's Day, not the Sabbath.

A. H. A., Rockstream, N. Y. What was the origin of Children's Day?

It originated in a suggestion to the Centenary Committee of the M. E. Church in 1865 to establish a Children's Fund in aid of the Sunday-Schools, and to appoint a day for gathering the offerings. In 1868, the General Conference recommended that the second Sunday in June be annually observed as Children's Day. In 1881, it was recommended by the London Methodist Ecumenical Conference; in 1882, the Evangelical Association; in 1883, the Presbyterians, and later other religious denominations fell into line.

Constant Reader, Arksvill, Ark. Please make plain this statement made by Rev. Dr. Talmage. I gave it to my Sunday School class and some in the school will not accept it. "There are 1,600,000,000 people now in the world, and 450,000,000 are Christians. Subtract 450,000,000 who are Christians from 1,600,000,000, and there are 1,150,000,000 left. Divide the 1,150,000,000 who are not Christians by the 450,000,000 who are Christians, and you will find that we shall have in the average less than three souls each, brought by us into the kingdom of God, to have the whole world redeemed."

His object was to emphasize the duty of greater Christian activity in spreading the Gospel and bringing souls to Christ. While recognizing the fact that it is impossible, through mere human effort, to redeem the world, we should realize that it is the duty of every child of God to labor for that end, which the Almighty himself will bring to pass in due time. The extract quoted is an object lesson in figures, intended to direct attention to the subject.

A. E. M., Decoria, Ill. Are the petitions in Matt. 6: 9-13, or the petitions in John 17, the true Lord's Prayer?

The prayer in Matthew is the model prayer which Christ gave at the request of his disciples as a pattern which they might follow. The prayer in John was his own prayer for

RELIGION and manliness are supposed in some circles to be incompatible. The young man who gives himself to Christ and makes his commands the rule of his life is regarded as having deteriorated, as having become weak, foolish and inefficient. It is expected that he will be inefficient in business, less agreeable as a companion and as having less value for the things that are pleasant in life. That religion makes a difference, must be admitted. It would not be a mighty force it claims to be, if it did not revolutionize the man being. But what does it give him? There are pleasures that it forbids: they are pleasures that are injurious to the man. He is ever without them even if he left him free to indulge in them. The gambling-house, the moon, the ball-room and the theatre are places in which he never received real benefit. He lived for this life only wanted to make the best of it, he would do well to get away from each and all of them. Their influence is only unhealthy. In these days, therefore, religion does not impoverish the life. Nor does it impoverish the character. The qualities that really make a man are not only permitted by religion, but enjoined. These are qualities which distinguish men from the brute creation. Generosity, kindly sympathy, compassion, magnanimity, forbearance, forgiveness of injuries, cheerfulness, firm moral courage, patriotism, honor, truthfulness,—all these and other qualities that make the finest type of character are inculcated by Christianity. The Christian is taught to cultivate them and his religion supplies him with motive and the power. There are all characteristics lead to the better performance of his duties in every relation of life. The Christian is the highest of all motives of a good son, husband, father, citizen, master, or servant, none cannot fail in his duty. One of these relations is that, at the same time, being true to his religious duty. He is sometimes accused of "other-worldliness," of being too much occupied with the things of heaven and heavenly things, as to be negligent of his present duty, but the God of his life gives him no encouragement to any such neglect. He is raised above mundane affairs only in being impregnable to their disturbing influence. When the trials, annoyances and afflictions of life strike him, they do not upon one who is standing upon rock, who has a support that they cannot shake. His faith in God makes him strong, knowing that God is his Father, and that all that happens to him is divinely permitted, he is not afraid of poverty or privation or sickness, or death itself, and he is therefore the fortitude which is the prominent characteristic of true manliness. He is surrounded with incentives above the passions and appetites that man possesses in common with the brute, to control and subordinate them to a higher nature which places him above the brute. His religion develops the spiritual side of his being, and thus elevates him in the scale of creation, bringing him nearer to God. So as he advances in spirituality he realizes the ideal of the Apostle: "Beholding as in a mirror the glory of the Lord we are changed into the same image."

THE LAND OF THE LORD.

"A LAND WHICH FLOWETH WITH MILK AND HONEY." — Num. 13: 3.

EL NATHAN.

JAMES McGRANAHAN.

1. There's a Land where God His love delights to show, 'Tis a goodly land Where milk and honey flow;
2. O the grapes grow sweet in clusters o-ver there, And the palm trees wave o'er flowers rich and rare;
3. In that land there's grace to conquer every foe, There's the peace of God to keep in ev-'ry woe;
4. In that land there's light for ev-'er shin-ing clear, There are songs of joy the an-gels love to hear;
5. Not on high, but here, the land must be possess'd, To the earth Christ came that here we might be bless'd;

And He calls His own of its ful-ness now to know, And to live in the land of the Lord.
While the springs and brooks make the valleys green and fair, Where they walk in the land of the Lord.
There's a love di-vine, mak-ing ev-'ry heart to glow, In the land where they trust in the Lord.
For they look to Christ, and no e-vil do they fear, They are safe in the land of the Lord.
And His word is sure, that we en-ter in-to rest, When we trust in the word of the Lord.

CHORUS.

Ye Re-deem'd, . . . hear the Lord, . . . "Fear ye not," march on, Take possession of the land,
Ye Re-deem'd of God, hear the Lord's command,

En-ter in, . . . While the waves of Jor-dan stand, En-ter in to the land of the Lord.
En-ter in by faith,

Walking With God.

THEY walk with God whom none can shame
From trusting in his holy Name,—
Who, looking for a glorious morn
Shrink not before the lip of scorn.

They walk in light, in safety, peace,
Awaiting patiently release.
Turn from the world and take the cross,
E'en though it be of life the loss.

Thus Enoch walked: while others strayed
In ways of sin, he God obeyed.
Till God took him: to him 'twas given,
Undying here, to enter heaven.

Thus Noah walked—an ark prepared,
Thus all his house salvation shared.

What recked he worldly scoff and jeer,
Since God Almighty was his fear?

Thus Abram walked when called to go Forth to a land he did not know,
A stranger and a pilgrim here—
Looked for a city to appear.

So Moses walked—serene endured
Affliction, and yon heaven secured.
And hence the wealth of all the earth
Compared with his, is little worth.

And thus the worthies of all time
Have walked with God, by faith sublime,
And earth was but a passage way
By which they reached the realms of day.

Science and Prophecy.

Prof. Totten's Forecast of the Results of the Approaching Perihelia of the Greater Planets on the Human Race.

IN a communication from Prof. Totten recently published by a New York daily journal, that famous expositor of prophecy calls attention to a planetary combination which is of very rare occurrence, and which he thinks may be the event of which our Lord spoke (Mark 13: 25), "The stars of heaven shall fall and the powers that are in heaven shall be shaken." In all the descriptions our Lord gave of the events that would precede his coming, he made emphatic reference to signs in the heavenly bodies. When these uncommon and unusual signs were seen, then Christians were to "lift up their heads, knowing that their redemption was drawing nigh." Prof. Totten points out that as the planets, which, like the earth, revolve around the sun, vary so largely in the time it takes them respectively to make the journey, it is obvious that their situation relative to each other will be continually varying and is susceptible of almost endless combinations. Mercury makes the circuit in eighty-eight days; the earth in 365, while Neptune requires more than 164 of our years to complete its gigantic journey. The peculiarity of the situation of the planets at the close of this century, as calculated by Prof. Totten, is that while all or nearly all of the planets will be on one side of the sun, the earth will be almost alone on the other.

"Only twice in the Christian era," says Prof. Totten, "has it happened that three of the greater planets exterior to the earth have been in coincident perihelia [that is in line at the part of their orbits nearest to the sun.] This occurred in the sixth century and in the sixteenth, two periods famous in history as periods of plague, pestilence and social perturbation. Now, however, we are approaching a period far more portentous. For the first time in the history of man all of the planets, exterior as well as interior, are approaching a coincident period of ominous and I cannot but believe malific influence. It will culminate only at the very end of this century, and may extend well over into the next. At that time all of the planets will be in line, tugging together at the sun, while the earth, upon the opposite side of the sun, will be subjected to their united action. I speak in general terms and upon premises that have been broadly published in standard journals. From the physical standpoint alone this condition of affairs cannot but result in widespread disaster, expressed in all the terms that nature knows, cyclones, earthquakes, tidal waves, &c., and among men, such an unbalancing of the normal condition as will try to their deepest foundations the institutions upon which the false system of modern society lives and moves and has its being. Already we can hear the mutter of the cosmic powers that are conspiring against us." These words bear a striking resemblance to the words in which Christ described the conditions which, when they existed, Christians were to recognize as signs of his approaching advent: "There shall be signs in the sun, and in the moon, and in the stars; and upon the earth distress of nations with perplexity, men's hearts failing them for fear and for looking after those things which are coming on the earth: for the powers of heaven shall be shaken." CHAPTER V.

EW surprises on both sides were constantly occurring in the early days of Pauline's visit. Her Boston cousins were making discoveries on their side, as Pauline was on hers. One day Belle came to her room. She leaned forward and began reading the titles of the books Pauline had selected for her study.

"Homer's Iliad and Plato. I told Mamma you were intense. Hallam's Middle Ages and Macaulay's History of England. I had no idea you had monarchical tendencies. I must take you to our little Chapel and show you the Communion Service that belonged to Charles the Second, or perhaps, it was one of the Georges, I'm not very clear on that point. My dear Paul, you're delicious! To think of anyone voluntarily undertaking to scrape acquaintance with all these dry as dust worthies. And in summer time!"

"It is not easy for you to understand how hungry I am," said Pauline, with a tremor in her voice. "You have been going to school all your life."

"Unfortunately, yes!" sighed Belle. "But don't pine for the experience. You will soon have enough of it. May I enquire when you expect to find time for these exhilarating researches?"

Pauline laughed. "Between the hours of 5 and 8 A. M." "Horrible!"

She faced round upon her suddenly. "I wonder what you think of us all? You are as demure as a field-mouse, but I know those big eyes of yours have taken our measures by this time. Come, let us have it, 'the whole truth,' you know. Don't be Ananias and keep back part of the price. 'Oh, wad some power the giftie gie us, to see ourselves as others see us!' I delight in revelations. Show me myself, Paul."

Pauline hesitated a little, then she spoke out bravely.

"I love you all dearly. You have been so kind! But Belle—if I had your opportunities, I would make more of my life."

"Do you believe in altitudes?" It was Richard Everidge. Aunt Rutha's favorite nephew, who asked the question, as they sat on the broad piazza after church, waiting for lunch.

"How do you mean?"

"I mean that trilogy of exulting triumph over the trammels of circumstance that Mr. Dunn gave us this morning. Don't you remember? 'Life is what we make it. An anthem or a dirge. A psalm of hope or a lamentation of despair.' Do you believe anyone can live in such a rare atmosphere every day?"

"Of course she does," and Belle laughed merrily. "Anyone who has courage to stroll through the Middle Ages with old Mr. Hallam before sunrise must have plenty of altitude in her composition. It's my belief she lives on Mount Shasta, in a moral sense, and I shouldn't be surprised to hear of her taking out a building permit at the North Pole, if she thought duty called her. But, Dick, how can you be such an atrocious sceptic as to doubt the possibility of one's living above the clouds when you know my Lady?"

"Ah, but she is Tryphosa, the blessed." "Tryphosa!" echoed Pauline in a mystified tone.

"That is her name," said Richard Everidge, with a tender reverence in his voice, "and she deserves it, for she is among the aristocracy of the elect. I never see her without feeling envious, and yet she has been a sufferer for years. I am amazed that Belle has let all this time pass with-

"There have been so many other things," said Belle. "Tennis, you know, and canoe practice, and tandem parties."

Her cousin laughed. "But that is only when Russ and I are not reading up for exams. What do you find to occupy your leisure?"

"Leisure!" exclaimed Belle, solemnly. "Leisure, my dear boy, has been an unknown quantity ever since I undertook to pilot this most inexorable young woman among the antiquities of our venerable city. She is an inveterate relic hunter. Is enraptured with Bunker Hill and the Old South, delights in Cornhill and wherever she can find a crooked old street that reminds her of Washington, and pokes about all the old cemeteries till I feel as eerie as Coleridge's Ancient Mariner. I believe she expects to come upon all the Pilgrim Fathers buried in one vault. But there is nothing special on the programme for to-day—we will go and see my Lady this very afternoon."

As they went in to lunch, Richard Everidge leaned over to Pauline and whispered:

"You have not answered my question. Do you think it is possible for common, everyday Christians to live above the clouds?"

"If I were a Christian," she said in a low tone, "I should want to get as high up as I could."

When they reached Tryphosa's, they heard her singing. They waited, listening.

Here brief is the sighing,
And brief is the crying,
For brief is the life!
The life there is endless,
The joy there is endless,
And ended the strife.

O country the fairest!
O country the dearest,
We press toward thee!
O Zion the golden,
Our eyes are still holden,
Thy light till we see.

We know not, we know not,
All human words show not
The joys we may reach.
The road is our pathway,
The joys for our sharing,
The welcome for each.

Then Belle opened the door softly and went in.

Pauline saw a large bay window opening into a tiny conservatory which loving hands kept dowered with a profusion of blooming plants. The room was large and dainty, with delicate draperies, two or three fine pictures, and a beautiful representation in marble of the Angel of Patience, which stood on a buhl table where the invalid's eyes could always rest upon it.

Tryphosa turned her head to greet them from the low couch which was the battleground where she had wrestled with the angel of pain during years of physical agony. Her eyes were lustrous with a radiance not of earth, and a wealth of silver hair fell in soft curling waves about her face; her mouth, sweet and tender, parted in a smile of welcome as she held out her hands to the girls.

Belle caught them in her own and kissed them gently.

"This is our cousin, my Lady. Aunt Mildred's only child."

The thin hands drew Pauline's face down and she was kissed on cheek and brow.

"Your mother was my friend, dear child, in the long ago." Then she added softly, with her hands on the silver cross at her throat, "Are you a Princess? Do you believe in it?"

Pauline shook her head. "No, my Lady."

"I am sorry."

They sat down then beside her. She held Pauline's strong hand between her wasted fingers.

Feed Them Properly

"Dear Mildred Davis. You have her eyes and brow, my child. It does me good to see you."

"That's just like papa," said Belle. "He says he can almost fancy himself back in the old home, with Aunt Mildred getting him ready for school."

Pauline colored with pleasure. No one ever spoke of her mother at Sleepy Hollow. She looked through the French windows into the conservatory.

"How beautiful the flowers are."

"You love them? Of course you must, to be your mother's child. It is such a comfort to me to lie here and listen to them talk."

"Talk!" exclaimed Pauline. "Do they do that, my Lady?"

Tryphosa smiled. "Surely," she said gently, "Every flower has its story, and every butterfly's life is a poem."

Belle broke the silence.

"We heard you singing, my Lady. I do not think Pauline had thought you would have the heart to sing."

A ripple of the sweetest laughter Pauline had ever heard fell through the quiet room, and Tryphosa's eyes flashed merrily.

"The pilgrims kept on their journey, and as they journeyed they sang," she said. "Do you think there is anything to cry about when we are on our way to a palace, dear child? But Sunday is always my resting time," she continued. "I do not sing as much through the week as I should. I am tired often and busy."

"Busy," echoed Pauline involuntarily, with a glance at the frail body propped up among the cushions.

Tryphosa gave another soft merry laugh and drew forward a rosewood writing-table which was fitted to her couch.

"Here is where I do my work, when my hands are willing, and then there are my dear poor people, and my rich friends, and sometimes the latter need as much comforting as the former. Oh, there is a great deal to do, dear child, for some have to be taught the way to the Palace, and some have to be brought into audience with the King," her voice hushed itself into a reverent whisper.

"And how about the pain, my Lady," asked Belle. Pauline's eyes were full of tears.

"Just right," she answered brightly. "Some days are set in minor key and then the Lord calls me where the waves run high, but so long as I'm sure it is the Lord, what does it matter? Not one good thing has failed of all that he has promised, and soldiers don't mind a few sword thrusts when they are marching to victory. 'This day the noise of battle, the next the victor's song,'" she closed her eyes and a triumphant smile played about her mouth.

"You seem so certain, my Lady," said Belle wistfully.

"Surely! 'For we know that he has prepared for us a city.'"

On such days Pauline could only sit beside her in mute sorrow, or sing softly some of the hymns she loved.

A RAJA'S GRATITUDE.

AN Indian Raja, Jay Narayan, used to reside in Calcutta. Being taken ill there, the Brahmins told him that if he went to Holy Kashi (Benares), bathed daily in the Ganges, and drank its waters, he would soon be restored. He set out for Benares, followed the advice of the Brahmins, but became worse. At that time he met an Englishman, a Mr. W., who said to him, "Raja, you are very ill." "Yes," was the reply; "I am, you see, dying." "Why do you not apply to a doctor?" "I am dying, I have spent lots of money on doctors, but all to no purpose." "I," said Mr. W., "know a Physician who could make you well, but I don't know whether you would agree to his terms." "How much will he demand?" the Raja asked; "a lakh of rupees?" ($500,000). "No! that would not satisfy him." "Will he take $750,000? or what will he take?" The gentleman answered, "The Physician of whom I speak, does not want your money. He will ask you for your heart; for this Physician is the Lord Jesus! Pray to him, ask him to make you well: at the same time take some simple medicine." The Raja did as he was advised; he prayed morning, noon, and evening, and in four months he walked upward of three miles to the gentleman's house.

Having been restored to health, the Raja asked his friend in what way he could repay the good Physician? The reply was, "Give him your heart; establish a school and endow it." The Raja regularly read his Bible and prayed. The school was established, government also gave a grant. The school—really a Mission College—is now under the Mission Society, with a competent principal and is doing a great work for the Master.

A Blind Singer's Hymn.

The famous temperance orator, John B. Gough, used to relate this personal experience. He says: "I was in a church in a strange city once, and the usher conducted into the same pew with me a person whose looks impressed me very unfavorably. The stranger had a face like mottled soap, which twitched as if a sheet of lightning had run all run all over it, and every now and then his lips would twist and give utterance to a strange spasmodic sound. I got as far away from him as I could. Presently the congregation sang the hymn:

Just as I am, without one plea,
But that thy blood was shed for me,
And that thou bid'st me come to thee,
O Lamb of God, I come.

"I saw that the man knew the hymn, and said to myself, 'He can't be so disagreeable, after all.' I got nearer. He would sing. It was awful, positively awful! I never heard anything like it. Occasionally he would make that strange noise with his lips. Then he would commence again and sing faster, to catch up with the other singers, and perhaps he would run ahead. They came to the next verse. He had forgotten the first line; and while the organist was performing the interlude he leaned toward me and whispered, 'Would you be kind enough to give me the first line of the next verse?' I did so:

Just as I am, poor, wretched, blind.

"That's it," said he: 'I am blind—God

Have You Asthma or Hay-Fever?

Medical science at last reports a positive cure for Asthma and Hay-fever in the wonderful Kola Plant, a new botanical discovery found on the Congo River, West Africa. Its cures are really marvelous. Rev. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, W. Va., writes that it cured him of Asthma of fifty years' standing, and Hon. L. G. Clute, of Greeley, Iowa, testifies that for three years he had to sleep propped up in a chair in Hay-fever season, being unable to lie down night or day. The Kola Plant cured him at once. To make the matter sure, these and hundreds of other cures are sworn to before a notary public. So get at its faith in its wonderful curative powers, the Kola Importing Co., of 1164 Broadway, New York, to make it known is sending out large cases of the Kola compound free to sufferers from Asthma and Hay-fever. All they ask in return is that when cured yourself you will tell your neighbors about it. Send your name and address on a postal card, and they will send you a large case by mail free. It costs you nothing, and you should surely try it.

help me!" and the tears came running down his cheeks and the eyelids quivered; 'and I am wretched, and I am paralytic.' Then he tried to sing:

Just as I am, poor, wretched, blind.

"At that moment it seemed to me I had never heard in my life a Beethoven symphony with as much music in it as in that hymn sung by that poor man, whom Christ had made happy in his lot."

A Heathen Lad's Mission.

R. J. W. Dwane and His Work Among the Kaffirs.

HERE came to the offices of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD a few days ago a bright looking native African. He was Rev. J. M. Dwane, a preacher of the Gospel in the land of his birth. He was born in 1848 in Kaffrland, of heathen parents, and became a Christian at sixteen years of age, about the time when Bishop first went out to Africa. He first heard the Gospel through his mother, who reported to those at home all the missionary had said. "The truth is, into my heart," said Mr. Dwane, "led me to see God." Dwane has been a missionary since 1871 under the Wesleyan Board. He was ordained in 1881, and his first work was at Elizabeth in 1875, where he stayed for years, from there going to East London (Cape of Good Hope), thence to Grahamstown, to Kimberly, and to Tembuland where he has now been for ten years. In 1892 he received permission from the Wesleyan Board to visit England in order to raise money for a school. In Tembuland he has organized a large church, and has several mission stations there, and appointed good men over them. "The people are very active," said Mr. Dwane. "We have from 300 up to 500 in the congregation, and have made much spiritual progress. They stick to it, here all Kaffirs, and are pastoral and agricultural; some of them, however, work in the mines. Last November we made a missionary connection with the Ethiopian Church, which has its headquarters in Pretoria; the association was organized in 1892. In my circuit, I am organizing the 'Clothing Schools,' to help the heathen children. In 1892, some ladies in England provided me with a lot of clothes. When the heathen children come to school every morning, they are first washed, and then I lend them clothes to wear while at school. After school they return them, and take their own clothes. Any child who has been regular and well behaved in school, is presented with the clothes as an encouragement. I should be glad to get the ladies in this country to give some clothes. "The antipathy of the Boers is not due to religion, but to our race. A native man is not allowed, under the Dutch law, to own land in the Transvaal or the Orange Free State." About June, 1892, a number of native Wesleyan ministers and laymen severed their connection with that body to form the Ethiopian Church. The ministers were Revs. McKone, Dwane, Tantsi, and others. They first established missions in the Transvaal, the Free State, and the Cape Colony. There are six or seven ministers, twelve deacons, and one hundred church members. The work is progressing more in the Transvaal than in the Cape Colony; but, owing to many difficulties under which the native missionaries labor in the Transvaal, progress is not so satisfactory as it would have been otherwise. In the Transvaal, they have been persecuted. Rev. Philip Boarder, who went up to Skukunisi country to preach the Gospel among his countrymen, was arrested and beaten, and finally driven from the country, and there are other instances of that kind; but, notwithstanding these conditions, the work is progressing, and prospects are encouraging. "The Conference which was held in Pretoria, on March 17, 1896," said Mr. Dwane, "passed a resolution to the effect that we should unite with the African Methodist Episcopal Church of America. It is thought that our union with that church will be the means of the conversion of the vast tribes of the dark continent, and the Conference elected Rev. Mr. Xaba and myself to go to America to arrange the terms of union with the African Methodist Episcopal Church. It is felt that unless we can have a native journal, and a good college where our young men and young women can secure a fair education, our work will be very difficult, and we have been instructed to make every effort to appeal in behalf of these two objects. In the old connection we have 14 chapels, 14 preaching places, 13 day school teachers, 15 Sabbath School teachers, 47 local preachers, 8 Sabbath Schools, 163 Sabbath scholars, 5 day schools, and 463 day scholars. The principal stations are Pretoria, Johannesburg, Vaal River, Buffelsdoorn, Maqashu, Cala, Hartingsburg, Vaalbosfontein and Ramo Kgopo's Location."

Even Oorfa is Hopeful.

"The immediate Trouble is Over," write the Missionaries—Relief Work Continues.

HE city of Oorfa in Armenia was the greatest sufferer in the massacres of last winter. It was estimated that 8000 Christians were slaughtered there. It will be remembered that Miss Shattuck, one of the American missionaries, together with her associates, played a most heroic part during those terrible days. Two remittances of $1,000 each were sent from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Fund for relief work at Oorfa. A few days ago this delayed acknowledgment of the first remittance was received:

OORFA, May 5th, 1896.

To the Editor of The Christian Herald:

DEAR FRIEND:—I have been somewhat delayed in acknowledging the welcome gift sent through THE CHRISTIAN HERALD for the suffering people here, but you will not imagine that we were indifferent to the arrival of the thousand dollars, which have come in time to feed, clothe, and otherwise sustain so many of those who confess the name of Christ amid sufferings of which you in America only know by such echoes as the telegraph and the postal service can give. Most of the help which we have been giving has consisted in clothes and in bedding, and so far we have been able to breast the wave of necessity; the immediate trouble is over. This is largely due to the fact that owing to the cheapness of cereals last winter, the poor people were not deprived of all their means of livelihood, because it would scarcely pay the plunderers to carry it away. But what shall we do next winter? I see little prospect of the people being able to store their usual supplies. Most of the bread-winners are dead, others are in prison, all are in straits and necessity.

The children of God in Oorfa send through me their loving regard and gratitude to their unknown friends of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

An attempt is being made to work up an industrial department for women and girls, in embroidery of felts and silk, embroidery of cottons, and also attempting the temporary care of a number of complete orphans.

I will give you some idea of what immense good you have done by your gift. The past week has been given exclusively to the widows and orphans in distribution of clothing. 565 new and 105 previous widows with 1885 orphans have received 2928 garments. The one piece which has been the general rule was a great joy as well as help at the Easter season. Most of them have had no butter and no meat during three months. The partial bread supply being mercifully continued by the government, and the cereals not having been generally taken by their plunderers, the people about us have not felt pinching hunger as was feared.

Women's Clubs in Persia.

Even the women of the Shah's country are in the line of social and intellectual as well as moral progress. It is delightful to hear, writes Rev. S. R. Dulles, of a club among some women in Persia, less well equipped, perhaps, in intellect and training, but not lacking in enthusiasm and the spirit of progress and desire to shine. "Our mothers' club," writes one of the missionaries, "last Friday was very nice, and fourteen were present. One lady talked well and profitably on 'Politeness.' Another woman also held forth, and when we were arranging who should speak on the next subject, 'Food,' with the naive and conceit so characteristic here, said, 'I'd like to speak on that.' She was instantly frowned down by some one else. We are planning to have the club only once a month, for fear the novelty will wear off, and they will tire of it, but so far they are enthusiastic and want it once a week."

Jesus is Coming Again.

JESUS, our Saviour, is coming again, Not as he once did, in sorrow and pain, Glorious, with honor, with power, with might, To clothe his own children with garments of white.

Those sleeping in Jesus awake and arise, And God wipes away all the tears from their eyes

As morning dispels all the shadows of night, So our Jesus is coming, our Sun and delight. In a moment, perhaps, while the evening star is twinkling, the watchers will see him afar, The redeemed are rejoicing, they shout and they sing, Giving honor and glory to Jesus their King. God's dealings with us—his mysterious way, In the splendor of heaven shine clear as the day.

Many saints of the Lord, here despised as unknown— In garrets and cellars, forsaken, alone— With the Hundred and Forty-Four Thousand they stand, Having bright golden harps and green palms in their hands. I watch for this morning, the dawn of the day, When Jesus is coming in glorious array. When the good and the faithful are never to part,

But are resting for aye on our dear Saviour's heart. Lord Jesus, my hope and my faith are in thee, Help me that in heaven thy face I may see.

Consumption

If you value your Life

Or the Lives of those nearest and dearest to you,

Read!

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you, demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

Dear Sirs:—About eleven months ago I bought from you an Electropoise for the purpose of treating cancer. I had one of about ten years' standing and it had reached a stage where it was making rapid progress, being about the size of a silver dollar. I am now happy to inform you that the cancer is no more; the Electropoise arrested the progress of the cancer perfectly in about 36 to 48 hours, and it gradually and slowly grew less until now there is a place about the size of a pin head that is not quite healed but gradually closing up. Very truly yours,

THE CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR CONVENTION.

Fifteenth Annual Convention of Christian Endeavor Societies to Assemble at Washington, D. C., on July 8th.

SEC. J. W. BAER. MRS. F. E. CLARK. MISS A. P. JONES. TREASURER SHAW.

THE prayer of the Psalmist for the capital city of his land will be echoed in thousands of hearts during the next three weeks.

new measures for extending his kingdom. For the time, Washington will lose the interest it usually has for the politicians; but the Christian, with a clearer perception of the true source of national welfare, will take a deeper interest in the city than at other times and will pray:

"Peace be within thy walls and prosperity within thy palaces. For my brethren and companions' sakes I will now say, peace be within thee."

The interest in these assemblies increases from year to year, and the impetus they give to the religious life of the nation is felt in the remotest corner. The provisional programme that has been issued of this year's Convention shows the reason of this. A personal element runs through the whole arrangements. Individual consecration and personal devotion to Christ and his cause form the key-note of all the proceedings as they have been outlined. The first evening is to be one of prayer. In twenty churches of the city meetings are to be held, at which, after addresses on the "Deepening of the Spiritual Life," there is to be a "quiet hour" for personal communion with God and a renewal of the pledges of service. On Thursday morning, July 9, at ten o'clock the business of the Convention will begin.

On White Lot, in the neighborhood of the Executive Mansion, there are three large tents, in which simultaneous meetings will be held. The tents are appropriately named, Tent Washington, Tent Williston, and Tent Endeavor. Portraits appear on this page of the three presiding officers: Rev. F. E. Clark, D.D., President of the United Society, Postmaster-General Wilson, and Hon. John Wanamaker. Three large choirs, each of a thousand voices, will give musical welcome to the delegates. President Clark's annual address and Secretary Baer's report are to be read in each tent. In the afternoon there are to be Denominational Rallies in twenty-eight churches, each of a different denomination, and each to be addressed by pastors belonging to the denomination. These will show the diversity of the Christian Endeavor hosts at the tent meet-

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

GOD IN LITTLE THINGS.

A Sermon Preached by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., at Washington, D. C., on the Text: Matt. 10: 29, "Are not two sparrows sold for a farthing? and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father."

YOU see the Bible will not be limited in the choice of symbols. There is hardly a beast, or bird, or insect, which has not been called to illustrate some Divine truth—the ox's patience, the ant's industry, the spider's skill, the hind's surefootedness, the eagle's speed, the dove's gentleness, and even the sparrow's meanness and insignificance. In Oriental countries none but the poorest people buy the sparrow and eat it—so very little meat is there on the bones, and so very poor is it, what there is of it. The comfortable population would not think of touching it any more than you would think of eating a bat or a lamprey. Now, says Jesus, if God takes such good care of a poor bird that is not worth a cent, will he not care for you, an immortal?

We associate God with revolutions. We can see a Divine purpose in the discovery of America, in the invention of the art of printing, in the exposure of the Gunpowder Plot, in the contrivance of the needle-gun, in the ruin of an Austrian or Napoleonic despotism; but how hard it is to see God in the minute personal affairs of our lives! We think of God as making a record of the starry host, but cannot realize the Bible truth that he knows how many hairs are on our head. It seems a grand thing that God provided food for hundreds of thousands of Israelites in the desert; but we cannot appreciate the truth that, when a sparrow is hungry, God stoops down and opens its mouth and puts the seed in. We are struck with the idea that God fills the universe with his presence, but cannot understand how he encamps in the crystal palace of a dewdrop, or finds room to stand between the alabaster pillars of the pond lily. We can see God in the clouds. Can we see God in these flowers at our feet?

We are apt to place God on some great stage—or to try to do it—expecting him there to act out his stupendous projects, but we forget that the life of a Cromwell, an Alexander, or a Washington, or an archangel, is not more under Divine inspection than your life or mine. Pompey thought there must be a mist over the eyes of God because he so much favored Caesar. But there is no such mist. He sees everything. We say God's path is in the great waters. True enough; but no more certain than he is in the water in the glass on the table. We say God guides the stars in their courses. Magnificent truth! but no more certain truth than that he decides which road or street you shall take to-morrow.

In the morning, when I look out upon the city, I am amazed to see how many people there are toiling with the work they have to do. I think three-fourths wish they were in some other occupation, and the other fourths find time in regretting that they got in the wrong trade or profession. I want to tell you that God put into operation all the influences which led you to that particular choice. Many of you are not in the business that you expected to be in. You started for the ministry and learned merchandise; you started for the law and you are a physician; you preferred agriculture and you became a mechanic. You thought one way; God thought another. But you ought not to sit down and mourn over the past. You are to remember that God arranged all these circumstances by which you were made what you are.

Hugh Miller says, "I will be a stone-mason;" God says, "You will be a geologist." David goes out to attend his father's sheep; God calls him to govern a nation. Saul goes out to hunt his father's asses, and before he gets back finds the crown of regal dominion. How much happier would we be if we were content with the places God gave us! God saw your temperament and all the circumstances by which you were surrounded, and I believe nine-tenths of you are in the work you are best fitted for. I hear a great racket in my watch, and I find that the hands and the wheels and the springs are getting out of their places. I send it down to the jewelers and say, "Overhaul that watch, and teach the wheels, and the spring, and the hands to mind their own business." You know a man having a large estate. He gathers his working hands in the morning, and says to one, "You go and trim that vine;" to another, "You go and weed those flowers;" to another, "You plough that tough glebe;" and each one goes to his particular work. The owner of the estate points the man to what he knows he can do best, and so it is with the Lord.

I remark further that God has arranged the place of our dwelling. What particular city or town, street or house you shall live in seems to be a mere matter of accident. You go out to hunt for a house, and you happen to pass up a certain street, and happen to see a sign, and you select that house. Was it all happening so? Oh, no! God guided you in every step. He foresaw the future. He knew all your circumstances, and he selected just that one house as better for you than any of the ten thousand habitations in the city. Our house, however humble the roof and however lowly the portals, is as near God's heart as an Alhambra or a Kremlin. Prove it, you say. Proverbs 3: 33, "He blesseth the habitation of the just."

I remark further that God arranges all our friendships. You were driven to the wall. You found a man just at that crisis who sympathized with you and helped you. You say, "How lucky I was!" There was no luck about it. God sent that friend just as certainly as he sent the angel to strengthen Christ. Your domestic friends, your business friends, your Christian friends, God sent them to bless you, and if any of them have proved traitorous, it is only to bring out the value of those who remain. If some die, it is only that they may stand at the outposts of heaven to greet you at your coming.

You always will have friends, warm-hearted friends, many-minded friends; and when sickness comes to your dwelling, there will be watchers; when trouble comes to your heart, there will be sympathizers; when death comes, there will be gentle fingers to close the eyes and fold the hands, and gentle lips to tell of a resurrection. Oh, we are compassed by a body-guard of friends! Every man, if he has behaved himself well, is surrounded by three circles of friends—those of the outer circle wishing him well; those in the next circle willing to help him; while close up to his heart are a few who would die for him. God pity the wretch who has not any friends!

I remark again, that God puts down the limit to our temporal prosperity. The world of finance seems to have no God in it. You cannot tell where a man will land. The affluent fall; the poor rise. The ingenious fail; the ignorant succeed. An enterprise opening grandly, shuts in bankruptcy, while out of the peat dug up from some New England marsh the millionaire builds his fortune. The poor man thinks it is chance that keeps him down; the rich man thinks it is chance which hoists him; and they are both wrong. It is so hard to realize that God rules the money market, and has a hook in the nose of the stock-gambler, and that all the commercial revolutions of the world shall result in the very best for God's dear children.

My brethren, do not kick against the Divine allotments. God knows just how much money it is best for you to lose. You never gain unless it is best for you to gain. You go up when it is best for you to go up, and go down when it is best for you to go down. Prove it, you say. I will, Rom. 8: 28, "All things work together for good to them that love God." You go into a factory and you see twenty or thirty wheels, and they are going in different directions. This band is rolling off this way, and another band another way; one down and another up. You say, "What confusion in a factory!" Oh, no! all these different bands are only different parts of the machinery. So I go into your life and see strange things. Here is one providence pulling you one way, and another in another way. But these are different parts of one machinery by which he will advance your everlasting and present well-being.

Now you know that a second mortgage, and a third and fourth mortgage, are often worth nothing. It is the first mortgage that is a good investment. I have to tell you that every Christian man has a first mortgage on every trial, and on every disaster, and it must make a payment of eternal advantage to his soul. How many worriments it would take out of your heart, if you believed that fully. You buy goods and hope the price will go up, but you are in a fret and a frown for fear the price will go down. You do not buy the goods using your best discretion in the matter, and then say, "O, Lord, I have done the best I could; I commit this whole transaction into thy hands!" That is what religion is good for or it is good for nothing.

There are two things, says an old proverb, you ought not to fret about: First, things that you can help; and second, things which you cannot help. If you can help them, why do you not apply the remedy? If you cannot help them, you might as well surrender first as last. My dear brethren, do not sit any longer moping about your ledger. Do not sit looking so desponding upon your stock of unsalable goods. Do you think that God is going to allow you, a Christian man, to do business alone? God is the controlling partner in every firm; and, although your debtors may abscond, although your securities may fail, although your store may burn, God will, out of an infinity of results, choose for you the very best results.

Do not have any idea that you can overstep the limit that God has laid down for your prosperity. You will never get one inch beyond it. God has decided how much prosperity you can stand honorably, and employ usefully, and control righteously; and at the end of the year you will just so many dollars and cents, just so much wardrobe, just so much furniture, just so many bonds and mortgages, and nothing more. I will give you one hundred dollars for every penny you get beyond that. God has looked over your life. He knows what is best for you, and he is going to bless you in time, and you for eternity; and he will do it in the best way. Your little child says, "Father, I wish you would let me have that knife." "No," you say, "it is a sharp knife and will cut yourself." He says, "I must have it." "But you cannot have it," you reply. He gets angry and red in the face, and says he will have it; but you say he shall not have it. Are you not keeping it from him? So God treats children. I say, "I wish, Heavenly Father, to get that." God says, "No, my child, I cannot have it." I get angry and say, "I will have it." God says, "You shall have it;" and I do not get it. Is he not kind and loving and the best of Fathers? Do you tell me there is no rule and no relation in these things? Tell that to men who believe in no God and no Bible. Tell it not to me!

A man of large business concludes to close out of his store, leaving much of his investments in the business, and he says to his sons, "Now, I am going to leave the business in your hands. Perhaps I will come back in a little while, and perhaps not. While I am gone you will please look after affairs." After awhile the father comes back and finds everything in a loose ends, and the whole business seems to be going wrong. He says, "I am going to take possession of this business—I know I never fully surrendered it; henceforth consider yourselves subordinates." Is he not right in doing it? saves the business. The Lord seems to let us go on in life, guided by our own skill, and we make miserable work of it. God comes down to our shop, or our store and says, "Things are going wrong come to take charge. I am Master, and know what is best, and I proclaim authority." We are merely subordinates. It is like a boy at school with a long string that he cannot do. He has been working at it for hours, making figures here and rubbing out figures there, and it is mixed up; and the teacher, looking at the boy's shoulder, knows that he cannot get out of it, and, cleaning the slate says, "Begin again." Just so God does to our affairs get into an inextricable entanglement, and he rubs everything out and says, "Begin again!" Is he not wise and loving in so doing?

I think the trouble is, that there is so large a difference between the divine and the human estimate as to what is enough. I have heard of people striving for things which is enough, but I never heard of any one who had enough. What God calls enough for man, man calls too little. What man calls enough, God says is too much. The difference between a poor man and a rich man is only the difference in bank. The rich man puts his money in the Washington Bank or the Central Bank or the Metropolitan Bank, or some other bank of that character, while the poor man comes up and makes his investments in the bank of him who runs all the quarries, all the mines, all the gold, all the earth, all heaven. Do you think a man can fail when I am backed up like that?

You may have seen a map on which is described, with red ink, the travel of the children of Israel through the desert to the Promised Land. You see how they took this and that direction crossed the river and went through the sea. Do you know God has made a map of your life with paths leading up to this bitterness and that success, through the river and across that sea? but, blessed be God, the path always comes out at the Promised Land. Mark that! Mark that!

I remark, again, that all those things hat seem to be but accidents in our life are under the Divine supervision. We sometimes seem to be going helpless and an-horless. You say, "If I had some other trade; if I had not gone there this summer; if I had lived in some other house." You have no right to say that. Every ear you wept, every step you have taken, every burden you have carried, is under Divine inspection, and that event which startled your whole household with horror God met with perfect placidity, because he knew it was for your good. It was part of a great plan projected long ago. In eternity when you come to reckon up your mercies, you will point to that affliction as one of your greatest blessings.

Going up the White Mountains some years ago, I thought of that passage in the Bible that speaks of God as weighing mountains in a balance. As I looked at those great mountains, I thought, Can it be possible that God can put these great mountains in scales? It was an idea too great for me to grasp; but when I saw a blue-bell down by the mule's foot, on my way up Mount Washington, then I understood the kindness and goodness of God. It is not so much of God in great things I can understand, but of God in little things.

There is a man who says, "That doctrine cannot be true, because things do go so very wrong." I reply it is no inconsistency on the part of God, but a lack of understanding on our part. I hear that men are making very fine shawls in some factory. I go in on the first floor, and see only the raw materials, and I ask, "Are these the shawls I have heard about?"

"No," says the manufacturer; "go up to the next floor;" and I go up, and there I begin to see the design. But the man says, "Do not stop here; go up to the top floor of the factory, and you will see the idea fully carried out." I do so, and, having come to the top, see the complete pattern of an exquisite shawl. So in our life, standing down on a low level of Christian experience we do not understand God's dealings. He tells us to go up higher and higher, until we begin to understand the Divine meaning with respect to us, and we advance until we stand at the very gate of heaven, and there see God's idea all wrought out—a perfect idea of mercy, of love, of kindness. And we say, "Just and true are all thy ways." It is all right at the top. Remember there is no inconsistency on the part of God, but it is only our mental and spiritual incapacity.

Some of you may be disappointed this summer—vacations are apt to be disappointments—but whatever your perplexities and worriments, know that "Man's heart deviseth his way, but the Lord directeth his steps." Ask these aged men in this church if it is not so. It has been so in my own life.

One summer I started for the Adirondacks, but my plans were so changed that I landed in Liverpool. I studied law and I got into the ministry. I resolved to go as a missionary to China, and I stayed in the United States. I thought I would like to be in the East, and I went to the West; all the circumstances of life, all my work, different from that which I expected. "A man's heart deviseth his way, but the Lord directeth his steps."

So, my dear friends, this day take home this subject. Be content with such things as you have. From every grass-blade under your feet learn the lesson of Divine care, and never let the smallest bird flit across your path without thinking of the truth, that two sparrows are sold for a farthing; and one of them shall not fall on the ground without your Father. Blessed be his glorious name forever. Amen.

Where Missionaries Rest.

The Elim Home at Belle Island, Dedicated to the Service of Tired Christian Workers, by Rev. Wm. James.

SUMMER has come and with it the opening of the various homes for all classes and conditions of people. It is a privilege for the city missionary to be able to send some poor patient who has been struggling with pneumonia, in a room where the sun never shone, to a convalescent home where he will at least have a chance for his life, or, perhaps some poor little cripple, who, during the tardy Spring has been growing more white and pinched from day to day, to some breezy mountain home like lovely Mont-Lawn, where, from the broad piazzas, the child may enjoy the beauties of the landscape, with its poor twisted little limbs resting on the softest of cushions.

Homes for the working girls, homes for wandering girls, homes for babies, homes for mothers, fresh air parties for children of every size and description. And what a busy morning it is when fifty children must catch an early train, or boat! By five o'clock a. m. the missionary is out, scouring her district, prompting the tardy ones, providing a few garments for the most destitute, and, where a drunken street is preferable to her little room.

Is this a fancy picture? It is not, there are missionaries in New York City to-day who have labored on for years with a salary of $25 a month, and some there are who have had but $20 a month. Without any other income to meet expenses, they have had to pay lodging, board, and washing. How could they save up money for vacation? Under such conditions the weary workers plodded on without a ray of hope, but while they waited God was preparing a willing heart, that would devise liberal things. The Rev. Wm. James was led to bring all he had to the Lord and ask how he might open a Home for such workers. Step by step he was guided into all the "good works that God had before prepared that he should walk in them."

On last Decoration Day, a little company of consecrated workers met to dedicate "The Elim Home," for that is the name Mr. James has given to the beautiful sea-side villa which he has fitted up so pleasantly for a resting-place, for the tired Christian workers. The Elim Home is situated on Belle Island, a few minutes' walk or ride by the trolley-car, from South Norwalk, one hour's ride from the Grand Central Depot. It can also be reached by boat from New York City during the summer, an excursion trip costing only seventy cents. The view from the Home is un-mother, too thriftless to get the little ones ready, lies in bed, the missionary with her own hands must wash and comb the children, supplying substitutes when the necessary clothing has been pawned, buttoning the little shoes with one of her own hair-pins, assuring the mother that the children will be well cared for and can be sent for any moment, in case the mothers should want them, and even carrying the smaller ones down the dark stairway. Then the home-coming. In rapid succession, parties of children have to be met at the extreme points of Greater New York. Each little one has a story that must be listened to, and in most cases a bundle of treasures to show. These are carried in the skirt of the dress turned up to form a basket, and when a quantity of apples or other fruit, far beyond the child's strength, is added, it becomes rather a difficult bundle for the missionary to escort home.

When all the available children in her district have had an outing, and two or three weeks are granted to the missionary for a rest, where shall she go? Not one of all the Homes can open its doors to her. After diligent search, she finds that there is no such place as she dreams of, "where the weary may be at rest." At any sea-side resort, board would cost from $10 to $30 a week. So the missionary sits down in her dingy little bed-room, and makes over some of her old dresses, and wishes it was time to go to work again, for even the surpassed. The Sound, which at this point spreads out into a broad, glittering sheet of water, some twelve miles in width, is studded with leafy islands, that are mirrored in the limpid waters until sea and sky and trees are so blended that they seem to be everywhere. Threading its way among the shining islands comes the endless procession of steam and sail. Hundreds of craft are always in sight, from the huge floating palaces of the Sound to the tiny, little, white-winged yachts. The lights of the passing vessels, as the night comes down, and the varied light-houses, each with its own distinctive character, add an irresistible charm, to the great, fragrant darkness, silent but for the soft music of the waves on the beach. "Beautiful for situation," the Elim Home is a model of comfort within. It was built a few years ago by a gentleman who intended it to accommodate large fishing parties during the summer, as this locality is the celebrated fishing ground of the Sound.

All The rooms are wide and airy, opening on broad piazzas covered with vines and shade trees. Here, reclining in an easy chair or a hammock, one can easily imagine oneself on the deck of an ocean steamer. The boat-house, nearby, has a number of boats large and small that all who come may enjoy the boating. Behind the house stretches a grassy slope and a circular, silvery bathing beach.

On this broad beach, mid-way between the Elim Home and Roton Point, Mr. James intends to have Gospel services during the summer, with a view to reaching the thousands of pleasure-seekers who visit Roton Point. During the last of July, a ten-days' Convention will be held. It will be undenominational. The pastors and young people from the surrounding towns have promised their hearty cooperation. A Gospel tent will be spread, and men of God, mighty in the Scriptures, will speak the Word faithfully to all who may come. The tent was the gift of a devoted Christian woman, who has done more for Missions, home and foreign, than most other living persons, and yet so quietly has she worked that few, even of her nearest friends have the slightest idea of what she is accomplishing. Wherever she plants a Mission she supports it entirely, forbidding even her name to be mentioned in connection with it.

A number of guests are already at the Home, and Mrs. James is there, to welcome and entertain all who may come. Competent helpers provide for the wants of all visitors. Mr. James is at the Home four days in the week, the other three days he is engaged at the Five Points House of Industry, where for some years past, he has been Associate Superintendent and pastor. It was while working among these poor children that Mr. James became so deeply interested in City Missions. Becoming a member of the New York Rescue Band, and spending night after night with other workers in the Rescue Missions of lower New York, knowing the tension of heart and brain that is required to do such work in the best manner, there was no one better fitted than he to devise a resting-place for workers themselves. He is a man whom it is a privilege to know. Converted when a boy, and early called to the ministry, during thirty years of pastoral work he has been marvelously blessed and used of God. Every large dry goods house and many manufacturing concerns, accord to their employees a vacation, because they will be more valuable when they return. Will our churches and Mission boards be less wise? We have not grown any stronger and wiser since our Blessed Master advised his little staff of missionaries to "Come apart and rest awhile." Why not communicate at once with the Home, and let every worker have an outing, if only for one week? The complete cost is only five dollars a week, and if the worker cannot afford this, let the church take it up and if both are too poor, then send the worker, and God will provide means. Money has already been sent to Mr. James to open a fund for those who cannot pay. If any one feels led to do likewise, he or she can send to Rev. Wm. James, Box 61, Rowayton, Conn., or 155 Worth street, House of Industry, New York. Any gifts are publicly acknowledged, and will be faithfully used as God shall direct.

A Brave Hindoo Teacher.

In the Woman's Missionary Friend is told the story of Pundita Ramabai, a brave Christian woman of Poona, India. She recently left her native society because it repudiated her work, and she decided to go fearlessly to a public hall and deliver to them in Marati a short address on the moral and spiritual slavery of the Hindoos, frankly telling them it was no use to cry out for political privileges, so long as the misery of their own social system crushed their women to the earth. Then holding up her Marati Bible, she read from it the cause of their moral degradation, finishing by telling them she cared nothing for their threats to do her injury, that she was free because the truth, as found in the Bible, had made her free. Her audience, worked up to the highest state of excitement, listened to her to the end, after which she went out as did her Master of old, "passing through the midst of them," and went her way. Ramabai's school in Poona has come out of the fire of persecution with firmer foundation than ever. About three-fourths of her girls are Christians. Her influence in a very large section has been steadily increasing, and the latest episode will only serve to render her still more useful to the cause.

David, King of Judah.

Sunday School Lesson for July 5. II. Sam. 2: 1-11. Golden Text, II. Sam. 5: 10. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

SAMUEL, the prophet, had anointed David in the midst of his brethren to be king over his people Israel (I. Sam. 16: 1-13); but David had long to wait before the position of king was given to him in the presence of his people. All this long waiting time was an education for the son of Jesse; he learned through it the great truths which God teaches us through his Psalms: "None that wait on thee shall be ashamed," and "Those that wait upon the Lord, they shall inherit the land" (Ps. 25: 3; 27: 9), and it became the habit of his life to wait on the Lord all the day (Ps. 25: 5). No one treated him as a king, the world knew Saul, God's rejected, as king; but David, God's anointed, was a fugitive. Thus are souls which God is preparing for future rule with him; they are called to exercise a kingly spirit in the midst of a world which knows them not, because it knew not Christ (I. John 3: 1).

How little we understand the ways of our God! We might have thought what a loss of time it was, when God had already chosen, singled out, and anointed David, that Saul should yet reign upon the throne of Israel as king after the Lord was departed from him! But all this time the people were making their experiences; they were learning what it was to have a king after their own heart, and they were being made ready, by their disappointment in Saul, to receive the king which was after God's heart. God hath "made all things beautiful in its time" (Eccl. 3: 11); the flower when it is opened; the fruit when it is ripe; the child in its childhood, all are beautiful.

In Their Own Season.

David, God's chosen king, would not have been made such a blessing to Israel if he had come to the throne a little earlier. The people knew well that he was the anointed of the Lord, and they saw constantly before their eyes one who could wait God's time, one who had learned the great lesson not to retaliate, not to force things, not to assert his own rights, a man who thrice had within his power the very man, King Saul, who was occupying the place to which God had called him; and who had used every means in his power to take away David's life; and yet David would not stretch forth his hand against the Lord's anointed. Like Christ, the Son of David, he "committed his cause to him that judgeth righteously" (I. Peter 2: 23). When God himself had executed judgment upon Saul, it was David whose life he had sought, that wrote Saul's elegy, and who was, at heart, the chief mourner over him! There was every opportunity for the people to know what kind of king David would make, whether he would seek God's interests and the interests of the people or his own. There was in the way in which David had dealt with Saul, and it needed all the long discipline of those years of waiting that he might learn obedience to God by the things which he suffered as Jesus, David's Son, learned afterwards (Heb. 5: 8). And we who are made a kingdom of priests of God and of Christ (Rev. 1: 6, R. V.), have also our waiting time. All God's kings have to graduate in the school of patience and of submission; they have to learn to be little that God may show forth his greatness in them. They have to learn to obey, that, when their time to rule is come, they may let God rule through them and manifest himself, and not them. All our work for God is comparatively of little importance when compared to our education, which is in view of a future reign, on a vastly different scale from anything here on earth.

Saul was dead, and, by the will of God, David was Israel's rightful king. But should he do anything to assert himself, or to take the honor to which God had called him? David's lessons in waiting on the Lord had not been in vain: "David inquired of the Lord, saying, Shall I go up into any of the cities of Judah? And the Lord said unto him, Go up." And God's king knew now that God's time for him had come. But a direction in general is not enough for one who is wholly given up to God; he must know also every detail. And he asked again, "Whither shall I go up? And he said, Unto Hebron." And, therefore, David and all his family settled in Hebron. Blessed is the man who his own dwelling place, and who, when he makes any move, considers first, Where would God have me live? and not, Where would it be pleasant or convenient for me to live? Hebron was celebrated in history; the old and faithful Caleb, who had wandered with God's people forty-five years in the wilderness, and who had seen an unfaithful generation die in the wilderness, while his own vigor remained unabated, and his physical strength unimpaired. (Josh. 14: 11), had claimed Hebron for his inheritance, and had, at eighty-five years of age, driven out the giants, the sons of Anak, which had dwelt there. (Josh. 14: 10; 15: 13, 14.) And there in Hebron, without lifting sword or spear, but simply settling down in the midst of the tribe of Judah, to which he belonged, David was anointed king by the men of Judah over the house of Judah. It was a first step.

The first act of his reign was consistent with all that had gone before in his relation with Saul; and manifested a love to his enemy which is worthy of New Testament times. Hearing that the men of Jabesh Gilead had buried Saul, although that city was not included in the small kingdom which had owned him as king, yet he sent messengers to the inhabitants, saying, "Blessed be ye of the Lord, that ye have shewed this kindness unto your Lord, even unto Saul and have buried him. And now the Lord shew kindness and truth unto you; and I also will requite you this kindness, because ye have done this thing. Now, therefore, let your hands be strong, and be ye valiant; for Saul, your lord, is dead, and also the house of Judah have anointed me king over them." Not a breath of retaliation, not a vestige of assumption, no trace of invidious comparison with Saul; David left his interests absolutely and entirely in the hands of God, and in true kingliness, dealt with others in complete independence of personal feeling. Such is the fruit of waiting upon the Lord!

But, having passed through his examination in God's school as to how he should represent his God in regard to his enemies, David had a much more difficult school to pass through in his relations with his friends and his adherents; and more especially with his nephew and general, Joab. Abner, Saul's general, had placed Ishbosheth, one of Saul's sons, upon the throne, and on his master's behalf, he disputed the claims of David. This finally brought about a state of warfare between Judah and Israel, in which Joab and Abner, the two opposed generals, played the prominent part: "David waxed stronger but the house of Saul weaker and weaker." (II. Sam. 3: 1.) But circumstances were constantly occurring which were not easy for David. Abner was a strong partisan of the house of Saul, but still a man who sought to prevent bloodshed when it was possible. He did what he could to save Asahel, the headstrong brother of Joab, and he it was who sought to put an end to the battle in which Asahel's death took place.

The strife of Abner and Joab did not bring about any definite result; God had another way. Ishbosheth reproached Abner unjustly regarding the woman, Rispah, and in his anger, Abner sent messengers to David making overtures regarding the kingdom. And David, who saw the hand of God in this thing, consented to Abner's propositions, on condition that Michal, Saul's daughter, whom he had married, and whom Saul had given to another, should be restored to him, and thus his honorable alliance with the house of Saul was re-established.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

DARDSHIP, privation and constant peril were the characteristics of the school through which David passed to the throne. Before he ruled his people, he had to learn what it was to suffer injustice, to be misrepresented and to be maligned. Some natures would have been soured by the experience, but David's strong manliness was invigorated by it and when most distressed, he drew closer to his God. With all his faults and all his sins, grievous as they were, there was an under-current of strong faith and reverence, which brought him back repenting to the right path, when his impulsive nature or strong temptation led him away from it. Six months ago, when our lessons on his life were interrupted, we left him consulting with his friend Jonathan and reaching the conclusion, in which Jonathan reluctantly concurred, that his life was no longer safe in Saul's court. He was in peril, not only during Saul's periodical fits of dementia, but in his sane moments. The king was jealous of him, and was convinced that David and not Jonathan would succeed him on the throne. Latterly, he seems to have thought that his own tenure of office was not secure and that David's popularity might so increase that he might be killed, or deposed, to make room for the young warrior. David must die, that was Saul's decision. It was dangerous to his own position to have the people applauding the young man, not only as a general, but as a man possessing that divine favor which had been publicly and formally withdrawn from himself. In Saul's distracted mind, the demon of envy had taken up its abode and would give him no rest while David lived.

David realizing the fact, left wife and home and the high position he had attained and fled for his life. During the next seven or eight years he was an exile and an outlaw. The historian tells many romantic adventures of this period. Hiding in caves and ravines and, when closely pressed, taking refuge in Moab, or among the Philistines, he lived the life of a hunted creature. In the meantime, Saul's misgovernment, his capricious tyranny and his mental incapacity caused popular discontent. David was not forgotten and his old comrades, persecuted for his sake, resorted to him. David found himself eventually at the head of an armed band of six hundred men. In the disorganized condition of the kingdom, he could employ them in protecting exposed positions from prowling bands of Philistines and from the nomadic tribes of the desert. That he lived by plundering these enemies of his people there can be no doubt, and the narrative makes no concealment of his prevarications and deceptions. For about a year he actually lived in a Philistine city formerly belonging to Israel, assigned him by Achish, who supposed that David's raids were on Israel, while he was really raiding the Philistines and their allies. To prevent exposure of his deception he was driven to the cruel expedient of killing every man and woman who could acquaint Achish with the real facts. It was part of the conditions of the time, and while it was impossible to defend David's action, it would be unjust to judge him by modern standards. At last the time came when the Philistines resolved to avail themselves of the opportunity afforded by Israel's distracted condition. Gathering an army, they marched northward and boldly invaded the land, intending, once for all, to crush Israel. If Saul could have had David's help then, Gilboa would have had a different ending. As it was, Israel was utterly defeated, and among the dead on the field were Saul and three of his sons. Broken and dispirited, helpless before the victorious Philistines, the hearts of the people turned to David. His own tribe Judah took the initiative, and, disregarding the claims of Saul's surviving sons, proclaimed David king.

David inquired of the Lord. Christian people sometimes forget to do this. An incident occurred a few weeks ago in New York, which shows how the habit of inquiring of the Lord may enter into daily life. A city-missionary was in need of the record of a certain incident of city life. It was needed immediately and very urgently. He remembered that he had seen in a certain library and he went there to search for it. He described the incident and a search was made for him through catalogues and indices, but no trace of it could be found. The article might be in any one of a long array of volumes. There was no reason why it was likely to be in one more than another. It would take days to turn them over, page by page, and the missionary was told that without some clue it would be too much trouble to find the article. He admitted that he had no clue, but asked permission to make the search himself and it was granted. In a few minutes he had found the article. "How did you find it, when we, with the aid of our catalogues and indices, could not find it?" he was asked. "Oh, you know my way," he answered; "I asked the Lord to guide me and he answered, as he always does. In any difficulty or uncertainty I always ask counsel of the Lord. He keeps his promise: 'In all thy ways acknowledge him, and he shall direct thy paths.'"

His two wives. The example of David, Jacob, and other good men, who were polygamists, is often quoted to justify polygamy. The argument is not quite fair. The important fact is overlooked that the practice was the fruitful source of trouble both to the man and his wives, and in the case of Jacob and David it caused lifelong misery. The argument from the instances of polygamy given in the Bible is that polygamy surely leads to sorrow. It is also apt to lead to crime as it did in David's case. A missionary reproving an Indian mother, who had killed her girl babies listened to this defence: "Why should I let them live? To be as miserable as we are? We work and slave and suffer for our husbands and when we grow old they bring a young wife into the home and we have to be her servants. I have suffered too much and have seen other women suffer too much to let my girls live. I killed them in their infancy."

They anointed David King. So they ratified the ceremony done by Samuel ten or twelve years before, by God's command. There was a great difference between the two occasions. At the first anointing David was a despised shepherd lad, but God saw his qualities and chose him for the throne. At the second anointing, David had proved his kingly capacity, and men recognized it. A story is told of a man wandering in South Africa who saw a child playing with a stone. He looked at it closely, and then asked the child's mother if he might have the pretty pebble. A present of a few coins and a piece of cloth was sufficient compensation, and he carried away the stone. He showed it to several persons who thought nothing of it. Finally he took it to Amsterdam to a lapidary there, by whom it was ground and polished. Then it was recognized as a diamond and was sold for a great price. God chooses his jewels in the rough. He knows their value before they are polished. Afterward men can see their beauty.

The Russian Pageant.

THE CORONATION CHAIR.

HE press correspondents and the artists who attended the magnificent ceremony of the coronation of the Czar at Moscow on May 26, have now supplemented the cable dispatches with fuller descriptions and with pictures. On this page is a reproduction of one of the most life-like sketches of the memorable scene of the Czar's procession to the Kremlin, where he formally assumed the crown and throne of his ancestors. The Petrovsky Palace, where he and the Czarina had been staying since their arrival from St. Petersburg on May 18, is outside the city. A salute of seventy guns from the guns of the grim fortress, announced the Czar's entry within the gates of the city. The procession was a marvel of barbaric splendor, representing Eastern and Western Muscovite dominion. A troop of cavalry led the way, followed by the Emperor's body-guard. Then escorted by Cossacks came the Khan of Khiva, the Emir of Bokhara, and other tributaries to Russia. These, dressed in extraordinary robes, blazing with jewels, and mounted on magnificent steeds, looked picturesque in their Oriental grandeur. The next in line were the nobility of Russia, and then the carriages of the royal princes and dukes, who represented the monarchs of Europe. The representatives of the Imperial household followed, and then came the centre of interest—the Emperor himself, mounted on a white Arab steed, and clad in the uniform of his favorite regiment. Immediately following, were two sumptuously gilded carriages, the first of which rode the Czar's widowed mother, wearing the ancient diamond crown that had been placed on her brows at a similar ceremony, thirteen years ago. In the second carriage was the Czarina, as yet uncrowned. At the City gate the procession was met by the Czar's uncle, the Grand Duke Sergius, Governor-General of Moscow, who gave him formal welcome to the city in ancient fashion, by offering bread and salt to the young Emperor. Vast crowds filled the streets, occupying every point of vantage, some of the people having come the night before to secure good places, and had stood there all night. Cheers rent the air as the procession passed and entered the sacred gate of the Kremlin. The ceremony of the coronation was in accord with the ancient custom. The regalia had been brought under military escort from St. Petersburg to the ancient capital several days previously. A picture of the various emblems appears on this page, and a description of them was given in this journal on May 13. The only difference between this ceremony and that of the coronation of 1883 was that in this, three thrones were placed on the platform facing the altar, the third being occupied by the Emperor's mother. The Emperor received the crown from the officiating priest, and placed it on his own head, and having seated himself on the throne in solemn state and received the sceptre and orb, he laid them aside and standing up, proceeded to crown the Czarina, touching her head for a moment with his own crown, and then placing upon it her own crown. The solemn anointing with the Holy Chrism, emblematic of the anointing of the Holy Spirit, was then performed, the Emperor being anointed on forehead, eyes, nostrils, ears, lips and breast, the Empress on the forehead only. It may be hoped that the young man will not be deceived by the homage and these imposing ceremonies. The crown, sceptre, sword, orb, and imperial mantle with which he was invested, are only the symbols of his august station. For the faithful performance of his duties, for which he, like the humblest of his subjects, must give account, he will need other equipment, and this is provided for him as for every man who will seek it.

Stand, therefore, having your loins girt about with truth, and wearing the breastplate of righteousness. . . . Above all taking the shield of faith. . . . and take the helmet of salvation, and the sword of the Spirit which is the Word of God, etc. (Eph. 6: 13-17.)

There is a penitentiary already there, but a new prison is needed, and it is proposed for convenience sake to have it in the neighborhood of the penitentiary. Plans have been drawn for a prison sufficiently large to accommodate three hundred convicts, with living rooms for the wardens and their true character. Seizing the girl they forced a gag into her mouth and bound her hand and foot to one of the pillars which run from the foundation to the ceiling of the cellar. Leaving the poor girl there, they ransacked the house at their leisure. They carried off all the silverware, money, jewelry and other portable valuables they could find and quitted the house unmolested. On their return the family found the house in their families and other officers, a chapel, and the usual accommodations of a prison. The Montana people, however, have, it appears, encountered a difficulty common to many public bodies as well as private persons. Though the prison is needed, the funds in the State Treasury are low. It has, therefore, been decided to utilize convict labor on the structure. The prison consequently will be built by men, many of whom will be incarcerated under its roof. There is a grim irony about this arrangement which is almost ludicrous, but, doubtless, the convicts will be compelled to do the labor. It is one of the penalties of wrongdoing that the wrongdoer, if convicted, loses the right to choose his own occupation. Those who pity them may

They do not blame her for their loss, as the men told so plausible a story which almost any servant would credit. The incident, however, will put other servants on their guard and prevent the trick being played elsewhere. It may also serve to put young people on their guard against a spiritual danger. They may never be bound and gagged by men who profess to have come to give more light to their house, but they may be made captives by Satan who often promises, as he promised Eve, spiritual and mental illumination.

Satan himself is transformed into an angel of light. (2 Cor. 11: 14.)

Telephone Ear.

A Chicago journal has been investigating the affection known as "telephone ear," and getting the opinions of physicians who have made a special study of diseases of the ear. In giving its readers the result of its study, it says that the use of the telephone four or five times a day will produce in a short time a very decided difference in the power of hearing between the right ear and the left. The telephone, arranged as it is with the receiver at the left hand, cannot easily be used in any other way than that of applying the receiver to the left ear. "You press the black muzzle of the receiver close to the ear, the speech of your correspondent agitates the diaphragm at his end of the line, and the waves of air gently strike upon the drum of your ear, and what one of the aurists of Chicago calls massage, takes place. Your ear is subjected to the same kneading process that is so beneficial when wisely applied to the flesh and muscles.

Its effect is an increase in the sense of hearing in that ear." The same principle applies to spiritual hearing. Those who listen to the still, small voice of divine guidance, find their ears become sensitive, and they get further directions.

Unto you that hear shall more be given. (Mark 4: 24.)

Swept Over Niagara.

A press dispatch from Niagara Falls reports that on June 8 there was a sad fatality there. While one of the visitors was standing on Luna Island, at the brink of the Cave of the Winds, his hat blew off, and, in making a sudden attempt to catch it, the man lost his footing on the slimy rocks, slipped into the water, and in an instant was swept over the falls before the eyes of the spectators. The fatal movement was doubtless wholly involuntary. No man, if he gave a second to thinking, would imperil his life for a hat. Unhappily, there are, however, many who are guilty of worse folly in risking eternal life in a frantic effort to make a large fortune.

What shall a man give for his soul, to lose his world and lose his own soul. (Mark 8: 36.)

manly little fellow got up from his seat by the door and moved down to the other end, to make place for a one-legged old gentleman, whose crutch would have made havoc of the dainty dresses. 'Thank you, my son,' said the old fellow. 'You have a good mother.' 'Best ever was,' was the smiling response of the little fellow as he raised his hat. That was a boy in a thousand, and his stockings were darned at the knee, and the hem let out of his short knee pants, so that riches had nothing to do with it. One must think sometimes, when riding in public conveyances, that 'good mothers' are a scarce article, or 'better boys,' boys with improved manners, would be more frequently met with." Christians, too, sometimes forget that the world may form its estimate of their Lord by their conduct.

Let your light so shine before men that they may see your good works and glorify your Father who is in Heaven. (Matt. 5: 16.)

Convicts Building a Prison.

Press dispatches from Montana describe the arrangements that have been made take warning of an analogous fate. It is easily possible to acquire an evil habit, or drift into an evil association that may become a bondage as much to be dreaded as a prison. There is little to choose between the man who builds a prison for himself and the man who forges a chain for his own wearing.

Thieves in Disguise.

A bold attempt at robbery was committed in New York a few days ago. The house of a wealthy citizen was left in charge of a servant, an honest German girl whose character is irreproachable. The family had gone to a picnic and were expected home in the evening. Soon after noon two men rang the bell and the servant went to the door. They had a bag of tools and some gas-pipe with them and told her they had come to fix the meter. Suspecting nothing wrong, the girl admitted them and conducted them to the cellar where the meter is. There they showed Sowing Seed in Japan.

ONE of the most indefatigable workers in the mission field in Japan is Rev. J. W. Wadman, whose labors are known to thousands of God's people in our own land. He sends us this letter, full of information and encouragement, concerning the progress of the Gospel in that distant country:

TOKIO, May 17.

Your kind favor reached Tokio while I was away on an evangelistic tour in the country, and since my return, so many pressing matters have occupied my attention that I have not had the time which I wished to have in order to reply to your letter. I want to thank you with all my heart for your kind words about my work, and above all, for the timely gift. Rest assured it will be expended in the Lord's work, and I shall use my best judgment to have it applied in keeping with what I understand is the spirit which prompts the gift.

And now let me outline a work which the Lord has laid upon my heart within the past few months. Ginza (Silver Place), is the principal business street of this great city of Tokio. It is our busiest thoroughfare, and it is largely made up of business houses of New Japan. For the most part these shops are owned and controlled by active, pushing, intelligent young men who have caught the spirit of the new life all about us, and who are pursuing Western methods of business and enterprise. Within the past two years, as head of the Methodist Publishing House, situated right on the Ginza, I have come in contact with scores of these young men, not only in a business way, but being also Superintendent of the English Night School and Gospel Society on the Y. M. C. A. plan, I have had opportunity of meeting a large number of these bright young men, teaching a little English occasionally, meeting them at our religious services, etc., etc. I have kept a record of their names and addresses, and as often as I can, drop into their stores and have a chat. They are always glad to see me and never too busy to converse. The Japanese are naturally the pleasantest people in the world to meet socially—when you come to know them and to speak their language. Now my plan—or rather the plan which I firmly believe the Lord has laid upon my heart—is to put into the hands of all these scores of young men, say two thousand, at least, a copy of the New Testament in Japanese, inscribing their name and, if desired, the name of the donor, with any words of exhortation one might wish. Do you not think this would be a noble work to carry out for Jesus? Surely his richest blessing would rest upon an effort of this kind, scattering the seed of his precious Gospel among the future commercial men of this great empire. I had quite a number of interviews, to interview each of these young men personally, and to make the presentation in a kindly way, and perhaps a tract, great good would be the result.

There are scores who would prize it as a precious treasure. It would take a year or more, for a work of this kind must not be done hurriedly, and it will pay. Of this there is no doubt. Unite your prayers with mine that it may.

In view of this plan of work, therefore, I shall proceed to spend this money which you enclose as the first expenditure in this direction, and shall trust the Lord to send me more help. It will surely come. In a day or so I will purchase 100 Japanese Testaments, inscribed within: "Presented by THE

for. Some few started to the front. Turning to Mr. Kamiya, I ventured to ask him to join them who were seeking Jesus. He hesitated, but only for a moment, then arose and we walked up to the inquiry seats together. Then we conversed and prayed, perhaps an hour or so—together, when at last my young friend declared that light and peace had entered his heart and he sang the praises of God. After the meeting closed, the Japanese pastor said to her, "Do you know whom you have led to Christ to-night?" I replied that I knew the young man only by name. "Well," said he, "that youth is the eldest son of an alderman and belongs to a very fine and wealthy family. If he withstands the opposition of his home, he will become a power for God."

I was deeply impressed and continued to pray very earnestly for this young man, for I well knew some of the trials he would be called upon to encounter in the flush and joy of his new faith. The next day I called at his home, but he was absent. The next evening he was in his English class as usual, and after school closed I found him waiting in the same place where he was standing a few nights before. As soon as I spoke to him, tears filled his eyes, he grasped me by the hand and whispered, "Thank God." I knew by this that some victory had been won, and so I led him into an empty classroom when he told me all about it. It appeared that his father was at first very angry and threatened to disinherit and disown him, but gradually his indignation cooled and anger abated, until that evening just before he started for his school, the old gentleman had retreated from his of prejudice to Christianity and they are really in a most receptive state. The old people of Japan are difficult to reach. The student classes are also difficult; but these young pushing business men are more inclined to Christianity (if they understood it) than any other class, and hence they are extremely hopeful. Let me cite an instance: A few weeks ago we were having special mission services in our Ginza church in the upstairs of which our Y. M. C. A. night-school is held. Praying along the halls, after my teaching was over, and on the way to the service below, I met a young man standing near the stair-case evidently waiting to say his pleasant "good evening" to his senpai (teacher). Putting my hand gently on his arm I said: "Mr. Kamiya, please come with me to the service to-night." "Yes, sir; I will go." So we went down together. As the service proceeded, an invitation was given to any who wish to become Christians to come forward and be prayed for. I had taken such a stand, he hoped that he would keep it and make the life of a Christian honorable. What a victory! What power there is in prayer! Since that, young Kamiya, who is unusually intelligent, has decided to enter our theological school and devote his life to preaching the Gospel, the father consenting to pay all his expenses. Indeed, we have reason (I have become quite well acquainted with him) to believe that he and the whole house will shortly embrace Christ. There is no happier youth in Tokio to-day than this same Kamiya Keinosuke. Yours very sincerely,

JNO. W. WADMAN.

Souls Won in Korea.

MANY of our readers who took a deep spiritual interest in the mission work of the late Dr. H. in Korea, will be pleased to hear how the work begun by that devoted laborer and his associates is now progressing. The following letter comes from one of the medical missionaries of the General Hospital in connection with the Korean Mission of the E. Church at the capital:

SEOUL, May 17, 1896

The $20 which THE CHRISTIAN HERALD forwarded to me to be used in the hospital work was received just at a time when we were in need of funds for the support of several men who were injured in the disturbances in the interior and who had come to us for aid. The funds will be expended in giving relief to these wounded men, several of whom already have expressed their gratitude for the aid given them. One man who had received a gunshot wound of the arm travelled 300 li, about 100 miles, to the Si Pyung Won for surgical aid, and I was glad to take him and care for him.

A short time since, while there was much disturbance in the interior, a band of armed robbers perpetrated outrages on the poor villagers, quite a number were attacked, some of whom received severe gun-shot wounds. Several of these have been in the hospital under treatment. One man who suffered from a gun-shot wound in the leg during the fight at Na Han, about thirty miles from the city, with us still. These gun-shot cases are with us generally a month or more, as we have excellent opportunities of telling them of Christ and pointing them to the Great Physician. One little boy who was attacked by a robber a short distance from Seoul, his load of wood which he was bringing to the city stolen, and himself receiving a deep wound of the neck on the hand, was brought to the hospital by a sympathizing friend who found him. The day after admittance he had a high fever and we were afraid serious results would follow, but with careful treatment he recovered, and yesterday he was discharged. Best of all he took away a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus, and, although such a young heart, God will bless the seed. His father and mother visited him several times while he was in the hospital, and expressed great wonder at the kindness shown by the missionaries and the excellent accommodations.

Mission work is very promising at present in Korea. The openings are more than can be filled by the present force of workers. Funds alone are lacking, but as it is God's work the money will also come in his good time. We must toil on, do what we can, and thank God that we have the privilege of laboring in such a promising field. I enclose two pictures, one is a group of hospital patients and their attendants. The picture was taken in front of the surgical ward. This forms one wing of the hospital and is all we have at present. The doctor in charge is in the back group standing with a sun hat in his hand. The gentleman sitting in front of the hospital doctor is Dr. Folwell, the new doctor appointed to Pyeng Yang. He is now at his station following the work which was so successfully commenced by Dr. W. J. Hall. The other is a picture taken from the front of the hospital compound, and represents in front the dispensary building and hospital gate, and in the background the surgical ward of the hospital. The dispensary door, as shown in the picture, is daily thrown open and before the doctor attends to their physical ills, a hymn is sung, and the doctor in charge or the hospital evangelist tells the people who gather from the street and the patients who have gathered in the waiting-room about their spiritual needs. This work to some may seem scattering and the people go back to their country homes and perhaps are never heard of again, but is it ours to say what the results will be? Has not the Master told us to preach? Oh, that the power from on high may descend upon the doctor in charge, the assistants and patients who gather in the Si Pyung Won, and that not only a great deal of suffering may be relieved but that many souls may be gathered in. Yours very sincerely,

JOHN B. BUSTEED.

The Crocus Bed.

LAST fall," said Beatrice Irving, looking wistfully out of the window, across the small back garden, where the snow still lay, a white blanket over the sodden ground, though winter was on the wane, "I've planted bulbs in that bed near the fence. Isadore and I broke our backs over all one day, but we've had such a chill-winter, so much storm, and rain, and yet, I'm afraid they will never come up."

"Why, sister?" interrupted Isadore in her cheerful chirrupy way, as she pinned her dress-stuff to the lining, and gave a pat here and a pat there, "why sister, how you talk! Our flowers always came up, same as those of other folks."

"Oh! I don't know as they do," said Beatrice eagerly, putting her hand against her side, and flushing a little. "Seems as if there never would be any back again in this world for me. I'm clear down and discouraged, and I wish I was dead, I do!"

A big tear rolled down her cheek, but before it could fall on the white satin bridal gown she was catching, Miss Isadore caught the sheeny fabric away, and held it at arms length.

"Beatrice Irving," said her Aunt Lucy, who had been reading by the window, while Isadore fitted her new gown. "You are cracked out completely, and that's all that ails you. Now, put on your gawl and bonnet, or stay, my niece will lend you her sealskin cloak, for it's very cool to-day, and you jump right into my sleigh, and I'll take you for a spin. Here, Emily," said Aunt Lucy, who was a prompt and peremptory little lady, turned to Beatrice, "you sit down and toast your toes and read, or rest, till we get back. Beatrice must have an airing, and the world'll look brighter in her eyes."

When the two had gone, with a merry ringing of bells, and a farewell laugh from Aunt Lucy, Isadore turned her grateful face to me.

"That was good in you, Aunt," she said. "Not every lady would be so sweet and so thoughtful, I am worried on Bee's account, Miss Emily. She's sort of pinching her faith to them crocuses." I may observe that Miss Isadore was not an educated woman, though 'the salt of the earth,' "and she thinks if they come up in the spring, Harry Jenks'll come back, and they don't she's main sure she'll never see Harry in this life again. She's got it into her head, and she dreams about it, and you can see she's all run down. 'Orkin' on Kitty Cameron's wedding-gown's been the last straw, and she's wear used up. I wish she had never seen Harry, that's what I wish."

"But my dear Isadore," I said, "you must not speak so of your sister's sweetheart. I have great faith in his honor. You know he was in my Sunday School class. I know Harry is to be trusted."

"Then why doesn't he write, and why didn't he send Bee even a Christmas-card, or a valentine, and how is it, his own folks ain't heard a word from him in two or three months? No, I think in that great wicked town of New York, Harry's fallen in love with another girl."

"Well, Isadore, I don't, and I don't believe Beatrice has that idea either. But this notion of hers about the crocus bed is silly. Of course they'll come up, when the spring sunshine coaxes them into the light."

God does not send us strange flowers every year. When the spring winds blow over the pleasant places, The same dear things lift up the same sweet faces.

I quoted, and Isadore smiled.

"I'm going to New York next week," I said after a pause, "and I'll look Harry Jenkins up for Beatrice, and let her know all about it."

And then I said no more, for the bells were jingling gaily at the door, and presently her pallor changed to pink, and her of the brain, and his knee is injured. You'll find him at the Presbyterian Hospital; he's doing well now, but he's had a close shave. Death and he ran a pretty near race of it for one while. Good-bye. Strange, nobody wrote to his people, but we didn't know them, and he's not been in a condition to inquire, and anyhow, it was nobody's business."

I went flying to the hospital, and fortunately struck a visiting day. Was this Harry Jenkins, white-faced, shaven, thin, but with the honest brow, and the plucky mouth, and the candid eye I knew. Of course it was, and I cried over him, and gave him all the home news.

"Tell my mother I'm all right," said the brave fellow, "though she knows it now, for one of the nurses has written for me, and tell Bee Irving, please, that I'll be at home with her again when the crocus bed is in bloom; I'll be at home all summer; I won't be able to work in this city for ages."

"And, Miss Emily, I want you to know that I haven't worried. God's been good enough to let me see I needn't. He's bringing everything out right. He can do it somehow."

I wrote to Beatrice that evening. I did not preach to her, but I did preach to myself a little. For, who does not worry, wondering why this happens, and that is allowed; troubling his heart with doubts and fears. Often there seems good cause, but when you think of it, there never is.

The Rising in Crete.

A Movement for Securing the Island's Independence of Turkish Dominion.

MANY recent events have been regarded by experienced observers as omens of the coming downfall of the Moslem power in Europe. The latest occurrence was the revolt in the island of Crete in the Mediterranean. For some time past the arrogance of the Turkish authorities and the Moslem threats to deal with the Cretan population as they had dealt with the Armenians, have served to keep the island in a ferment. A strong Reform Committee was organized among the native population, and it formulated demands which included the economic independence of the island, and the appointment of a Governor of their own choosing, to supersede Ferik Abdullah, recently appointed by the Porte. Athens was said to be the centre of a strong Cretan revolutionary movement of which four Cretan patriots were the military leaders. It was rumored that England was favorable to the revolutionary movement and that the Greek government would afford every facility to the patriots. Meanwhile, the Sultan's government, pursuing its usual tactics, arrested a number of supposed Cretan sympathizers in Constantinople. Orders were promptly given by the Ministry of War for the transportation of thirty-eight battalions of troops from Smyrna, Beyrout and Salonica to Crete for the suppression of the impending revolt, which thus far had not assumed very formidable proportions. A Greek vessel carrying munitions of war to Canea, on the island, was seized by the Turks. Several encounters took place between insurgent bands and the imperial troops, but the casualties were insignificant. The Turks, however, made even these small incidents the provocation for marauding and they pillaged and burned twenty hamlets in the interior of the island.

On the 8th inst. the Turkish troops occupied the principal military positions and controlled the roads, making it quite certain that any attempt at a popular rising would be quickly subdued. At the present writing, the trouble seems to be at an end, temporarily at least, though there is little doubt that Crete will sooner or later be prepared to strike a blow for independence.

The Sin of Laziness.

Concerning the widespread evil of laziness among those who might reasonably be expected to be active in the Christian life, a writer in the Indian Witness has this to say: That this universal unwillingness to expend life's fuel in work of any kind prevents many persons from meeting their religious obligations ought to excite no surprise. And we must not make the mistake of concluding that because laziness often trips us up, that therefore our feet are not in the right way. Laziness sometimes keeps men from praying who take more delight in prayer than in anything else. Laziness sometimes keeps men from reading the Bible who love that Book above all others. Laziness is a clog to many feet that are disposed to be swift for Jesus. Laziness often closes a mouth that would rather speak for Christ than for anyone else or for anything else. Laziness in some degree is a part of the garb we wear: it is one of the limitations of our being: it is one of the disabilities inseparable from the present life.

If it is asked, "What are we to do about it?" the answer is, do not let it control you, do not let it prevent you from doing or becoming just what you feel and know you ought to be; but on the other hand, do not write yourself down traitor to any good cause because sometimes you feel the hand of laziness upon you.

THE REVOLT IN CRETE—VIEW NEAR CANEA, THE "WHITE MOUNTAINS" IN THE DISTANCE eyes quite bright, in ran Beatrice, looking like a picture in my sealskin, and as sweet as a girl could be. The air and my sensible Aunt Lucy's conversation had helped her, and she took Kitty's wedding gown in hand again quite cheerfully.

We went our ways, and in the course of a fortnight I packed my trunk and came to New York. After a few days of visiting and sight-seeing, I bethought me of the lad who belonged to my home up country, and to the girl he had left behind him, and I took a seat one morning in a Columbus Avenue car and went whirling round the curves, and tearing round the corners, away and away till I found myself far down town among tall warehouses and dingy edifices, quite different from the gala streets where fair ladies go shopping, and the windows are a wonder to see, with the rich stuffs and mingling colors and the jewels and laces, and everything splendid that money can buy.

Well, I discovered the place where Harry Jenkins had worked, and stepping into the elevator, I was borne up, up, up, a crazy height, and the elevator went at a dizzy rate, and I got to the room and asked for him.

"Hurt? you say he was hurt?" I asked of a grizzled and tired-looking elderly man who left a desk and came forward, seeing a bewildered young woman looking about her, in an unfamiliar spot.

"Yes, Harry Jenkins was hurt a week or two before Christmas; a cable car knocked him over, and he had concussion for the Lord's care is always over us, and even in times of accident, illness, poverty and danger, that care does not fail.

Harry Jenkins and the crocus bed together convinced Beatrice that she had been faithless in her fretting, and when later, the Hosfords came from the city and needed a gardener and chose Harry, and he and the little dressmaker were married and went to live in the lodge at the Hosford's gate, her last doubts vanished. For,

It may not be thy way:
It may not be his own way:
But yet in his own way
The Lord will provide.

That hymn comes in pat in a good many tight places.

The Peace He Gives.

WHAT is the peace that Jesus had? He said, "My peace I give," and then Went out to bear from cruel men The scourge, the buffeting, the cross, To bear the world's great load of sin. And had he peace? Yes, peace within.

This is the peace that Jesus had:
A peace that gave him power to bear
The dreadful cross and all the woes
Inflicted by his cruel foes.
Without a murmur, but his prayer
Was made for those who placed him there.

This is the peace that Jesus gives:
A peace that helps us follow him
And suffer, and yet feel within
A calmness that the world knows not,
He does not give an easy lot,
But peace within, sweet peace within.

A Lost Season.

WE had no Spring this year. We jumped from Winter into Summer. The train of the seasons seems to be off the track. There is some doubt as to where April and May went. We have had all the people out looking for the two lost children. The crocuses and violets knew not what to do with themselves, and lost their way. The buds were mocked of the weather. We skipped the Spring. The bridge over which we passed had a snow-bank for pier at one end and a June rose for pier at the other end. We are quite sure, however, that the seasons are rightly driven, and that it is a great impertinence on our part to think that we could command the weather more wisely. But we are this season reminded of that large class of young persons among us who seem to be skipping the Spring. We have but few boys and girls now. Society tries hard to usher our young people from babyhood into manhood or womanhood without any halt between. We talk about manly boys and womanly girls, when we should not have anything of the kind, but only boyish boys and girlish girls. There is between infancy and mature life a season of frisk and frolic and glee and romp that ought not to be interfered with. There ought to be a good long period of roundabouts and short dresses. But the fashions are more and more changing, until now the boys of eight have stove-pipe hats, and the girls have all the flounces and frizzes and shirrs of womanhood. So they skip the Spring. The blossoms and flowers and buds are frosted. The children spring from March into June. Now we are certain that society will never improve on the old-fashioned boy and girl. Our children need a number of years from the strictness and demands of society—years sacred to ball and bat and hoop and kite and marbles and boisterous fun. While the natural order of the seasons seems broken up, do not let society compel our young people to skip the Spring.

Religious Twaddle.

NOT the result of the Christian religion, but of the Christian religion, is the twaddle of the religious. It is gentle enough, and active enough, and well-meaning enough. It is the twaddle of the religious. It can sweetly sing at a prayer-meeting, and smile graciously when it is the right time to walk, and make an excellent nurse to pour out with steady hand a few drops of peppermint for a child that feels disturbances under the waistband, but has no qualification for the robust Christian work that is demanded.

One reason for this is the ineffable softness of much of what is called Christian literature. Religious twaddle is of no more use than worldly twaddle. If a man has nothing to say, he had better keep his pen wiped and his tongue still.

Church Quarrels.

WE see an account of a clergyman severely chastised by his congregation and another minister who proposed to take the pulpit. The discomfited clergyman was flung down the pulpit stairs while the other minister was ascending the opposite side. This scene was rather lively for a church, and we protest against it. But while reading it, we thought whether or not there was any more sin in such a bellicose encounter than in many of the church quarrels of the day. How often elders and deacons look daggers at each other, if they positively do not wield them. How often people would hurl a minister down the stairs, if it would not read badly in the newspapers. How murderously Mary Jane looks across the church at Elizabeth Ann. What violent antipathy going down from generation to generation between the two leading families of the congregation. The minister which one family likes the other despises; and the sons and daughters take up the ecclesiastical grudge when their fathers and mothers yield it with their last mortuary struggle. Would it not be better for the two families to appoint each a champion, and let them go out on the village green, and in physical encounter, settle the dispute? Indeed we prefer to this greater evil of life-long embitterment the lesser evil of the aforesaid pulpit tussle. A disease that comes to eruption is better than that which lingers in the blood and kills the patient.

Present Opportunity.

YOUR Christian father and mother, who have been holding beneficent influences over you, do you not realize they are going away from you? Do you not notice that they do not get over sickness as soon as they used to? Are you not aware of the fact that they do not get over a cold as quickly as once? The fact is that they have made more prayers for you than they will ever make again. They have passed the last mile-stone on the road home, and if you are going to get any benefit from them, get it now, or get it never. Some of you do not know what it is to stand and look down upon the still and rigid features of a Christian father or a Christian mother. I do. In five minutes you will think of all the unkind words you ever said to them. You may cover up the coffin with wreaths, and crosses, and crowns; but you cannot make anything attractive out of it. It is trouble, and nothing but trouble, for those who sit and sigh with the consciousness that those dear lips will never pray for you again, and those lips will never sympathize with you again. When you stoop down and kiss for the last time the wrinkled brow just before the lid is screwed on, you will think of what I tell you now. O, if father and mother be still alive with their Christian influences, cherish them while you may. Take their example. Be profited by their prayers. They are ripe for heaven and cannot stay.

The first notable engagement of the new Anglo-Egyptian campaign against the dervishes, took place recently at a place known as Firket, near the Nile, and resulted in the rout of the dervish force which was superior in point of numbers. This Egyptian battle-field is shown in the illustration on the opposite page, which is taken from a photograph. After the first rout, the Egyptian cavalry pursued them, killing large numbers and taking many prisoners. As the fugitives fled toward Suada their pursuers followed and found that place—which had been lately the Khalifa's largest camp—deserted. This victory leaves the whole of the Nile valley, north of Suada, in the hands of the Egyptians.

A Priceless Souvenir, Free!

ALTHOUGH you may never visit the Holy Land, such are the wondrous facilities at our disposal to-day that we can bring Palestine almost to our very doors. When the Palmers and Pilgrims of old journeyed to the land of the Saviour's birth, they themselves were almost worshipped on their return, and any memento they brought—such as a flower, a scrap of soil, or even a stone—was an object of deepest veneration to multitudes. Those times have long passed away, but to-day the soil, the hills and vales, the rocks, the flowers, and even the ruins of Palestine, are still very dear to true believers throughout the world.

Remembering this, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has secured, exclusively for its own readers and their immediate friends, a fragrant and precious souvenir of Palestine, which will be warmly appreciated. Amid the multitude of flowers that deck the Judean hillsides at this season, there is none so rare nor so highly valued as "the Lily of the Field." More than any other blossom, it gives color and variety to the landscape. Its deep tint enriches the floral carpet of the plain and brightens the waving flower-ropes of the hills. Splendid, almost regal, in its dyes of bright carnation, leaves of poppy-red and stamens of black, it stands out boldly among all the others, and challenges the attention and admiration of the beholder. Studying these peculiarities, one ceases to wonder that "The Lily of the Field" should hold such a prominent place in the Sacred Writings, and that the wisest of men, King Solomon, should have conferred upon it most significant honors in connection with the building of the Temple, as the only flower that was chosen to serve as a model for King Hiram's "skilled workers" in the decorations. On the brazen pillars themselves and upon the chapters, there was carved "lily work" of most marvelous beauty and delicacy and the brim of the molten sea "was wrought like the brim of a cup, with flowers of lilies." And the Saviour, in recognition of the royalty of this peerless flower, contrasts its incomparable hues and textures with the coarse and showy tinsel of Israel's king, when he said: "Consider the lilies of the field, how they grow. They toil not, neither do they spin; yet I say unto you that Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these" (Matt. 6: 28, 29). We can picture in imagination Jesus, as he spoke these words, sitting by the lakeside in Galilee, and holding up to the gaze of his disciples a single royal-robed lily of Palestine, plucked from fields where its purple progeny still delight the eye and charm the sense of the beholder.

Summer comes early in Palestine, and for several months, Rev. H. B. Greene, who returned to the Holy Land especially for this work, has been busily gathering these royal flowers, and preserving, pressing and packing them for shipment to New York. On arrival, each full and perfect flower has been artistically mounted, none that has suffered in transmission in the slightest particular, being used. The color, texture, and form of the flower, the spread of the purple leaves, and even the delicate foliage of the stalk, have been admirably preserved. It is our purpose to present one of these mounts, each bearing a perfect specimen of "The Lily of the Field," absolutely free, to each and every subscriber who will send us the names and mail addresses of twenty-five friends or acquaintances, who are not at the present time subscribers or readers of this journal, and no two of whom are members of the same family or household. These names should be plainly written and mailed to the Publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York, as soon as possible, and a "Lily of the Field" will be promptly forwarded. In this manner, without any outlay whatever, our readers can secure a Souvenir that could not be bought or procured, except at fabulous cost, and which, by reason of its intrinsic beauty and sacred associations, will afford them the greatest pleasure and satisfaction. Every mount will be sent under cover, all charges prepaid, to any address desired.

News of a Wicked Plot Against Missionaries in China comes from Tientsin, to which place it appears to have been sent from the scene of the disturbance. A crowd collected, and the doctor being challenged to prove his charge, dug into a heap of shavings and rubbish in the yard and unearthed the body of a child that had been dead about twenty days. There is no doubt that the doctor had placed the body there himself, but the crowd became furious and destroyed the mission. Friendly natives helped the missionaries to escape from the mob, and then, providentially, no lives were lost.

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

Every reader of this journal should examine the Free Souvenir Offer on page 480. These beautiful "Lilies of the Field" are for all, and can be secured by any reader who sends twenty-five names and addresses to the Publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, in accordance with the instructions.

Subscriber, Greenville, Tenn. Have Christians any right in expecting such a harvest of the Holy Spirit as the apostles had at Pentecost? May they hope to attain sinless perfection by a new and gradual growth in grace?

The descent of the Holy Spirit at Pentecost was for a special purpose. It was to endue the church with special miraculous powers especially with the gift of speaking in languages previously unknown to them. Their exceptional circumstances required exceptional gifts. We do not think that Christians have any ground in expecting such gifts. At the same time, we think God does endow his servants with powers they need for the work to which he calls them and many have been conscious, in preaching and teaching of divine help in a remarkable way. The sinless perfection you speak of is an ideal toward which every man should strive. We infer from some of your remarks, however, that you regard it as a condition in which vigilance may be relaxed, when temptations cannot overcome you and when you cannot sin. You will never attain such a condition. Do not be deceived. There is no such thing as watchfulness to the point where man is in this condition and he will be exposed to temptation and is liable to sin.

Subscriber, Berlin, Canada. The Parable of the Pounds is given by Luke for Christ speaking the Parable of the Pounds is "because he was nigh to Jerusalem." Luke 19:11. What had that to do with it?

The next clause of the verse is "and he said unto them, 'Behold, I am going away, and ye shall see me again, and ye shall be rewarded for your faithfulness.'"

Subscriber, Lima, Peru. What is the creed of the Abyssinians?

Loofs, a distinguished authority, in a recent article in the Christianity Week, at London, says that with the exception of a small percentage of Mohammedans and Fanatics (Jews), the Abyssinians are all Christians. Grand Rohlfs, the famous traveler, estimates that the number of Abyssinians is not less than 1,500,000. They are ecclesiastically ruled by an Abuna or bishop who must always be a Copt, and whose power is superior even to that of the king. The Abuna resides at Gondar, the capital. Next come the archbishops, sub-presbyters, deacons and sub-deacons. There is a monkish order, at whose head is the Estager, and the manager of the church's property is an official known as the Nebwid, who has representatives in every church. Priests hear confession and grant absolution. There are probably 12,000 priests and monks in all, who live on the common people. In the northern monastery there are over 200 monks, and a single village church has twenty priests. The service is liturgical and the leading features approach more nearly to that of the Greek Church than any other.

F. M. Rudley, Cal. Do you think it wrong or a sin to hold a Gospel Temperance Society on Sunday evenings, under the auspices of the W.C.T.U.?

Absolutely not; you could hardly be better employed.

Raymond Hines, Washington, D. C. 1. Is lying or killing dissimulation common to savage people? 2. Is it so-called civilized peoples? 3. Is it a justifiable practice under any circumstances?

and Persia, the Zoroastrian and Egyptian theologies, the ancient writings of Greece—is doubtless known and recognized in every land under the sun. Unfortunately the complex life of civilization and its many vices have been the cause of increasing the tendency to dissimulation. 2. No, not even under the old, time-worn plea of necessity. A lie has no legitimate place in the universe, for it is in direct opposition to God, who is truth itself and who cannot lie. Therefore to lie, even in the slightest degree and under the most extreme provocation is to desert the side of truth and to oppose God, in whose image we are made and to whom we should strive to conform. It should not be forgotten, however, that there are often occasions when silence would serve us even better than words, and where the truth may well await a fitting opportunity for expression. But even in such cases, we must be careful that our silence does not produce an impression that would be the equivalent, in its effects, of a lie actually uttered.

C. S. M. Hazleton, Pa. What is the meaning of the word "Salem" in the parable of the Pounds? "Salem" is a Hebrew word meaning "peace." What does the word "Salem" mean? Who were the daughters? Where and when did they weep?

"Salem" (from "Shalem," peaceful), is an archaic form of the name Jerusalem, and is sometimes used by writers when referring to that city. The leading Jewish commentators have been perpetuated even to this day. Every traveler in the East knows that the natives have a legendary or traditional, and partly or wholly mythical history for everything, and sometimes more than one. So with Cain's wife, who, Epiphanius says, was named Sava, while Malalios, another writer, calls her Azura, and the Arabs give her still a different name. Buttman, Eisenmenger, Hottinger, and other writers give about all the mythology of the matter, including the various Eastern traditional fictions about Cain and Abel's twin sisters, Cain's temptation by the devil, who showed him how to commit murder, and a variety of similar stories—the whole being as fantastic and unreal as any of the myths of Greece and Rome.

Faithful Reader, Portsmouth, O., writes:

Will you please some time give the readers of your valuable paper a sermon for young men who are traveling with the many circuits that cross the country? None but those who have friends who are obliged to support themselves in that manner know what temptations they meet with. Many of them are sons of Christian mothers. They are too often forgotten and looked upon as lost.

Bereaved Mother, Lewiston, Me. Is there any Scriptural ground for hoping that I shall know my dear boy, eighteen years old, who is gone to heaven, when we meet?

David seems to have thought there was ground for such a hope and to have derived comfort from it. He said of his dead child, "I shall go to him but he shall not return to me." (II. Samuel 12: 23). The Parable of Dives and Lazarus (Luke 16: 23), appears to afford another reason for the hope. Of course allowance must be made for the intimation being in a Parable, which may not necessarily be true in all its details, but we cannot conceive of Christ misrepresenting the facts. He certainly represented Dives as knowing Lazarus. A third reason is the fact that Paul expected to tian does not want; he would not exchange "the peace that passeth understanding" for all the world's distracting pleasures; yet he finds in the new life, a constant and unfailing source of interest. 2. Every aspect of life has a new meaning to him, and the way is opened to joys he never dreamed of before. His social life and surroundings, too, are more enjoyable, and he finds that no legitimate avenue of amusement is closed to him. He is debarred from nothing except that which is a detriment to spiritual growth and for such amusements or recreations he has no taste. It is a great mistake to imagine that the Christian life is necessarily dull. On the contrary, it has every reason and every facility for brightness.

H. C. N. Are visitors allowed at Mont-Lawn at the Children's Home? Also, if they can go and return on the Chrystenah or is that boat just used by the Home? I have a great many "Little Gleanings" and would like to send them to the Home if they would be acceptable.

Yes, visitors are welcome. You can go there either by the S. S. Chrystenah, or by Northern R. R. of New Jersey, taking stage from Nyack. Our little guests at the Children's Home are as a rule plentifully supplied with reading matter. What is needed is wearing apparel suitable for boys or girls between six and ten years.

W. A. B. Bynums, Ala. Is it not reasonable to believe that one's capacity who has spent his life in the service of humanity and God, is further developed to enjoy more the pleasures of heaven than one who barely is saved?

Undoubtedly. Just as there are degrees of fidelity and service, so there are degrees of capacity for enjoying the felicities of heaven. (See Matt. 25: 20 to 26; I. Cor. 15: 41, 48, 49; Ps. 62: 12).

If the writer of a letter signed "One of the Sorrowing Mothers," will send us her name and address, we will send her a sermon which Dr. Talmage preached a few years ago on the subject she mentions. He holds the same views now as he held when he preached the sermon.

W. J. G., Mount Forest, Ont. What is the Inland Mission belong to?

It is inter-denominational. Some of the missionaries are Episcopalians, others Congregationalists, Presbyterians, Baptists, Methodists, &c. They work together harmoniously, because their supreme object is to preach Christ to the heathen.

E. M. R., Amphion, Tex. Can you give me the exact date of our Saviour's birth and death?

No, they cannot be ascertained beyond doubt. Prof. Samuel J. Andrews has made an exhaustive study of the subject, and in his Life of Our Lord, published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York, you will find his reasons for arriving at his conclusions. He believes that the evidence preponderates in favor of December in the year of B. C. 5 for Christ's birth, and with still better reason that he was crucified on April 7, A.D. 30.

Reader, Vancouver, B. C. I have been impressed for some time past, that I ought to follow a certain course, the wisdom of which I have doubted, but still the question forces itself upon me. Would you take it as Divine guidance when any question continually comes before you and you are impressed that you ought to do it?

Not necessarily so. There are so many things that might combine to give you the impression spoken of. You may have in your secret heart a longing to do a thing which it would be altogether wrong to do. The better way is to pray over the matter and wait patiently for the unmistakable opportunity which will surely come if the course be divinely directed.

Christian, Lemon, Pa. Don't you think it would be a good thing to have a season of revival in the States at least if not all over the world—could unite in a week of praise to God? I do not mean to have any special meetings, but just in their own homes and where business calls them, to praise his name and not murmur or utter any complaints. Don't you think it would be a good way to commence a season of revivals?

It would indeed be a grand thing if the whole Christian world could unite in a week of general Thanksgiving instead of a comparatively small portion of it, as now, devoting a single day to that object.

unite in this identification and the same name is applied to the holy city in Psalm 76: 2. The hymn refers to the scene at the Crucifixion where the daughters of Jerusalem or Salem who had followed Christ to Calvary, witnessed the last act of the Divine Tragedy. Subscriber, Providence, R. I. I observed lately a statement published in the New York Sun, from a correspondent, that "Cain married his sister Rhipha." It also, on the authority of Duprion's Chronicle of the Jews, that St. Augustine said that this was the tradition of the Jews in his time. Other traditions, equally as good, maintain that the mother of the twins, Azura, Azura, or Climia. Eve gave birth to twins every year for thirty years, always a boy and a girl. Cain and Abel, according to Jewish tradition, quarrelled over their wives, Cain desiring to have Abel's twin sister Deborah, Owain or Lebuda, instead of his own twin Calmana, Azura, or Climia. Another tradition makes them quarrel over the division of the earth; and still another over the spelling of a word in the Pentateuch. This has caused a great deal of controversy, and not being able to arrive at any satisfactory decision in regard to it, I write and ask you to kindly explain through your valuable columns.

Such a statement needs no explanation. The Sun's correspondent has simply drawn upon some of the numerous myths that are still preserved in the East, regarding our first parents and their offspring and the beginnings of mundane things. Such legends are mainly referable to the early monkish and rabbinical writers, whose credulity and inventiveness, in their treatment of Arabic, Greek, Hebrew, Syrian and Egyptian legendary lore, were about equal. Although the church swept aside as apocryphal a great mass of literature of this description, some of the legends and traditions know and be known of his converts "in the presence of our Lord Jesus." (I. Thess. 2: 19).

L. A. Essler, Concord, N. H. What is the meaning of the word "Sheol"?

It means "the place of departed spirits," or "the state of the dead," and is derived from a verb which signifies to ask, conveying the idea of something which is never satisfied. The phrase, "The insatiable grave," conveys the same idea.

A. H., Berne, Ind. As Jacob is spoken of with great honor in the Bible I should like to know whether his conduct in forcing Esau to sell his birthright and his deception of his father were approved of God. Did he do right? Were there any exceptional circumstances justifying him?

His conduct is nowhere approved in the Bible. In fact it was most unjustifiable. The Bible does not conceal the faults or wrongdoing of good men. It tells the story of David's awful crimes without reserve. Jacob's wrongdoing led to his banishment from home, and separation from his mother between whom and himself there appears to have been a very tender affection. He suffered retribution too in being tricked by Laban and in the terrible anxiety he suffered later on, when he heard that his brother was coming to meet him with four hundred men; and still later when his own sons deceived him about Joseph. The whole story of his life shows that he was continually learning by hard experience the evil of his early vices of duplicity and hard bargaining.

Market Day in the Soudan.

How the Natives do their Trading—Honesty and Fair-dealing the Rule.

ALTHOUGH the Soudan is one of the most important and extensive tracts of African territory, comparatively little is known concerning it, either by Europeans or Americans. Its climate, for the most part, is inhospitable and deadly to the white traveler, and its people—for there are several nations, comprising many millions in all in the Soudan—are either Mohammedan or heathen. Bilad-es-Sudan ("the country of the blacks") stretches from the Senegal river to Abyssinia, but only a very small part of it has ever been privileged to hear the blessed Gospel. Of the Christian missionaries who have penetrated there, with the message of love, a goodly proportion have sealed their devotion with their lives—victims of the climate.

There are, however, some sections of the Soudan to which the white man has brought something of civilization and progress. This is true of the French Soudan. On this page, we give a photographic illustration, showing a phase of commercial life among the people of the French Soudan that is most interesting. It is market day, and the native ruralists have come to town to dispose of their produce. They are not slow to cry their wares—which may consist of bananas, cassava, plantains, durrah, etc., which they exchange for cotton, game, iron utensils or cooking pots. At such markets may be found a great variety of products, cereal and otherwise. Nearly all transactions are in barter. A white visitor to such a market is at once struck by the honesty of the natives and the fine athletic figures of the men. They are remarkably honest in all their

It has been frequently stated, without reservation, that Africa is unfit for the habitation of white people. This, however, has been contradicted, in part at least. The personal experience of many missionaries, traders, and others has demonstrated that there are many sections of the "Dark Continent," where the European or American may live in comparative health and comfort to a good old age. Abyssinia, Mashonaland, part of Nyassaland, and the French Soudan are not now regarded as insalubrious. In Adamawa—back of the Cameroons—the land is said to be high and rolling and extremely healthful. In the fertile valleys, banana, maize, cotton, plantains, indigo, and durrah are extensively cultivated, and there are good markets. Yola, the Fulah capital, is finely situated, at the foot of Mount Atlantika.

Horses and cattle thrive in Adamawa. The Fullahs (so-called because of their comparatively fair skin, of light copper or bronze hue), are spread over a district embracing four great provinces or divisions, occupying a natural basin between the Niger and Bornu. All the land is rich in agricultural products, and nearly every variety of grain known in Africa is successfully cultivated. Originally from Senegambia, the Fullahs have multiplied remarkably in their present location and have become one of the most powerful, intelligent, and widespread of all the peoples of the Central Soudan and its neigh-

But the dressing of the hair, the richness and good taste of the jewels, enhance, in the most harmonious manner, the beauty of the women of Akhaltzikh. The festive headgear, composed of a diadem of golden coins, from which hang down along the temples and even to the breast, pendants of beautiful pearls terminated in ancient pieces of money, is most becoming, especially when a veil of Indian or Persian muslin is thrown over it. It can be said of them in general that they are very active housewives. Their skilful fingers are ready at every industry. According to her social position, the Armenian woman spins and weaves wool and cotton, with which she makes the clothing for the family. It is she who, receiving from her ancestors the art of making these beautiful carpets, the secret of such designs and of such shades, hands them down in her turn to her children.

Cuban Hospitality.

THERE is no more courteous people on earth than the Cubans. Even the peasants are polite and well-bred. People a valley with half a dozen half-naked children poorly dressed and hard-worked woman, and a man in pail-loons and shoes, with a machete lashed to his side and spears on his cow-skin shoes, and have a picture of the mass of Cuban peasants and their homes, says a writer in Travel. Yet this man will receive the most courteous treatment, if he take shelter under his roof from an impending shower, or drink in any way his hospitalities. There is a remarkable grace in his manner and there is nothing in his bearing of awkwardness and sequiousness generally associated with his class. His politeness never deserts him. He salutes the companion on entering and leaving a house, takes off his hat with a "Good morning" "God be with you" as he passes in the fields. It would be an unpardonable breach of good manners in a Creole to eat or drink without first offering to do one about him. The Creole is not only graceful in his manner, but forcible in his expressions. While talking, his whole frame is in movement, and one ignorant Spanish could almost guess the drift of conversation by the pantomime. The morality of the clergy in Cuba is appalling. Left in gross ignorance and superstition there is perhaps much wanting to make the Cuban peasant admirable, but he is indeed a very lovable fellow. The manners of a Creole girl are also remarkable. Whether bred in the thatched cottage of the poor montero, or in the stately mansion of the wealthy planter, she intuitively acquires all the graces of a well-bred lady.

borhood. There are in the four provinces between 7,000,000 and 8,000,000 souls, and some of their towns have a population of ten thousand.

Travelers who have penetrated to the far interior of the Soudan, tell of great populations, considerable cities and a degree of commercial activity. Probably the most wonderful country is that around Lake Tchad, long regarded as mysterious, if not mythical, where native empires have risen and passed away, and races have come to power and dominion, only to be subjugated in their turn and superseded by others—all these changes being unknown to the outer world. The rapid march of civilization, the progress of railroad building, and the struggle for colonial expansion will ultimately result in opening up this tropical wonderland to the world and bringing its vast variety of products, its peculiar industries and its people into contact with the younger and more vigorous races of the earth.

Beautiful Armenian Women.

Doubtless the most graceful and distinguished women in Armenia are those of Akhaltzikh. Their dress is the most elegant and the most original. The materials employed, although sombre in shade, are woven and dyed by them, so that they are found nowhere else. The ungainly Turkish trousers have disappeared; a skirt well fitting, a bodice open on the breast, and a open waist in gold and going to do with them. He said, "Bury them." So she begged he would give them to her, and he was quite willing and they were brought to the Missionary Home. All the children there are girls whom their parents did not want, and would have got rid of in some way. It is dreadfully sad that the Chinese think so little of the baby girls. It is not so bad in every part of China, but in the Foo-chow district they throw any number of children into the river every year.

A Pretty Swiss Home Custom.

In a letter from a lady who was spending the season among the Tyrolean peasants, a very pretty custom is mentioned. On the morning after her arrival she was "awakened by the sound of a violin and flutes under the window, and hurrying down, found the rooms adorned as for a feast—garlands over the door and wreathing a high chair which was set in state. The table was already covered with gifts brought by the young people whose music we had heard. The whole neighborhood were kinsfolks, and these gifts came from uncles and cousins in ever far-off degree. They were very simple, for the donors are poor—knitted gloves, a shawl, baskets of flowers, jars of fruit, loaves of bread; but upon all some little message of love was pinned. 'Is there a bride in this house?' I asked the landlord. 'Ach, nein!' he said. 'We don't make such a pother about young people. 'Tis grandmother's birthday.'

Our Debt to Our Country.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor paper for the Week Beginning July 5. alm 122: 1-9.

PATRIOTISM as a debt and as a duty has a claim on every one. There are crises in which it is recognized in that light, and when the response is general, as in our war, or when the land is menaced by a foreign enemy. Then there is no difficulty in finding men who love their country so well that they are willing to die for it. No one knows, until the crisis comes, how many such men there are. There was no greater surprise, in our time of trouble, than that with which many men quit their business and their families and endure hardships of the march and the peril of the battle-field. When both flags there were men who had made no noisy demonstrations of patriotism, and before the war seemed engaged in their own affairs, yet they could not bear to remain at home when their country was in peril. With the fullest distance for the influence of all motives, there must have been a large number in both camps who would not have been there but for their love of their native land and their sense of their duty as citizens. How more deeply would the patriotic spirit be stirred if a foreign enemy assailed us. Then latent fires would spring into flame, and it would be seen how deeply men loved their country.

There are, however, other times in which patriotism may be manifested besides that of fighting. It is not in the last time of peril, only, that our country has need of the love of her people. In time of peace, we have duties which no true patriot can ignore. She has enemies which do not come against her with panoply of war, insidiously, which would undermine her strength and degrade and debase her. As a father sometimes had to say of his son or his daughter, "I would rather have followed him to the grave than witnessed this shame," so patriots will feel about their native land when it became vile and corrupt. A worse evil than subjugation by a foreign foe, would it be that Satan should rule in the forces of evil should debauch our people. We owe it, therefore, to our country by every means in our power we should strive to save her from such a fate. To every generation in its turn the welfare of the nation is committed in sacred trust. Education, order, liberty, religion, come down to us from our fathers; it is our duty to hand them intact to our sons, with adaptation to the new circumstances which later experience has indicated. All that is inherited is entailed. It is our duty to improve and to maintain, but never to impair. For this, we owe our country the light of a beneficent religion, the religion of Christ.

Nothing to us, it is a protest against the sin of selfishness. If we are followers of Him who laid down his life for the world, we shall not live for ourselves. A nation of individuals intent only on getting, who know no Gospel but the gospel of getting-on, who have no concern for the poor, no higher aim in life than the acquisition of riches, and who are lightly of the "righteousness which exalteth a nation," must inevitably become sordid and perish. Against this spirit every Christian should be a living protest. It is the evil that in this generation we have most to dread. The life of a man consisteth not in the abundance of the things he possesseth.

Prophecy Misunderstood.

How the Apostle Paul Relieved the Distress of a Church.

BY RICHARD CHESTER.

ONE of the passages relating to the Second Advent most frequently misunderstood, is II. Thessalonians 2: 1-8. Many people draw from it the erroneous conclusion that certain events must occur before the Lord comes to summon his waiting people. If, however, we rightly understand the circumstances of the Thessalonian church, to which the words were addressed, we shall see that they were not intended to convey any such impression.

The Thessalonians were "shaken in mind and troubled" by a belief or opinion which had become prevalent amongst them concerning "the day of Christ," or rather, "the day of the Lord," for so Dean Alford affirms that all the oldest authorities give the passage. This "day of the Lord" is the day of his executing long delayed judgment upon an evil world. "The Day of the Lord!"

The day in which "the Lord Jesus Christ shall be revealed from heaven with his mighty angels, in flaming fire taking vengeance upon them that know not God, and obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ." The belief of the Thessalonians concerning this day was not—as the palpable mistranslation in our Authorized Version has led so many to suppose—that it was "at hand," but that it was "present," that they were actually in it. Their belief—strengthened, if not in the first instance occasioned, by the severity of the trials which they were at that time undergoing—evidently was that the day of the Lord's judgment upon the professing Church and the ungodly world had even then commenced; that they were then, as it were, under the first droppings of that thunder-cloud of judgment in which the Lord, the Avenger was about to be revealed; that instead of having been "taken"—as the Apostle's teaching in his pre-epistle had led them to expect—before that day of judgment had set in, they had been "left" to undergo its terrors.

Such a belief might well cause them to be "shaken in mind and troubled;" might naturally lead them to question either the truth of the Apostle's previous teaching, or the reality of their own Christian profession: to doubt whether they were Christ's people at all. To remove at once such utterly false impression from their minds, the Apostle proceeds to "beseech them by the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ and by their gathering together unto him," which, as he had previously instructed them, were to be the very first in order of all Second Advent events, "Not to be shaken in mind or troubled" by the notion that "the great and dreadful day of the Lord" had come.

That judgment day, he goes on to assure them, could not come until a "falling away" had taken place, until a hinderer to the revelation of "the Man of Sin" had been taken out of the way, and until "the Man of Sin" himself had been revealed. No judgments, however severe, which might be inflicted upon the professing church; no trials, no chastenings, however great or protracted, sent upon Christ's own people should, he teaches them, be regarded as belonging to that day of judgment, or as indicating its commencement, unless, or until, the Advent for his saints and their "gathering together unto him" shall have first taken place. Nothing is to have precedence of that event.

CHAPTER VI. Bring and Doing.

LIFE took on quite another aspect for Pauline as the light was shed upon it in her talks with Tryphosa. The sufferer loved Pauline for herself, and still more because she was the daughter of her girlhood's friend. The girl's crude imaginings as they had come to her in her sordid life at Hickory Farm, were freely told into the sympathetic ears of this gentle, beautiful old lady, and they were heard tenderly, and their errors were gently exposed and the true way was pointed out. Never did discipline listen with more reverence to a teacher than Pauline listened as she sat by that couch of pain and patience.

"It is terrible to see you suffer so, my lady!" she cried one morning, when in the fulness of her strength, she had gone from the laughing sunshine into the shadowed room, where every ray of light fell like a blow upon the invalid's quivering nerves.

Tryphosa made answer with a smile. "Not one stroke too much, dear child. It is my Father's hand upon the 'tribulum.' He never makes mistakes."

One day she slipped away directly after breakfast. She wanted to be sure of finding her alone.

It was one of the invalid's good days, and she greeted her with a bright smile of welcome.

"My lady," she began abruptly, "do you think I have forgotten all about my promise? I couldn't. It has haunted me through everything, and—I gave myself to the King last night."

Tryphosa's eyes glowed deep with pleasure. "Thank God!" she exclaimed softly. Then she closed her eyes, and Pauline knew from her moving lips that she was talking with the Lord.

She touched Pauline gently.

"I had to talk a little about the good news with Jesus. He is my nearest neighbor, you know. And now dear child tell me all about it. What a wonderfully simple thing it is! People talk so much about being a Christian when after all it is simply to be Christ's. We open the door where he has knocked so long, and let him in. We give ourselves away to Jesus henceforth to live in him, with him, by him and for him forever. Dear child when you were giving, did you include your will?"

"My will!" echoed Pauline startled.

"Why, surely. The Christian is not to direct his Master."

"But how do you mean, my lady?"

Tryphosa began to sing softly,

Give me Jesus, my Lord,
Give me Jesus, my Lord,
Give me Jesus, my Lord,
Give me Jesus, my Lord.

"That is his message to me. Yours will be different, for not two of his children get the same message."

"Your lot seems very hard to me," said Pauline. "Do you think I shall have to suffer, too, in some way?"

"I cannot tell. Christ knows what is best in every case. We simply trust him, you know. We give ourselves to him for him to use as he will. Perhaps with you, the call may be to activity, with me it has been not to do, but to bear. The lapidary knows what each stone requires to bring out the qualities of it. The physician knows the kind of treatment his patient requires, and prescribes in the one case exercise, and in the other tranquillity. The gardener takes one plant into the hot-house and sets another out in the cold. In each case the object is to bring out the best in the thing. Now if there is wisdom in the treatment of a man, it will be well. But suppose there is opposition. Suppose there is no confidence in the wisdom, and there is a shrinking from the course prescribed? What then?"

"Then," said Pauline, the best will be missed."

"Yes, and there has been no true giving of one's self. Something has been held back. It has not been a gift, but a conditional bargain. It is as if one had said, 'I retain the right to judge. I will do or bear what I am called to if I agree that it is best, if I see the object and purpose of it and if it is agreeable.' You see that is not a full and free gift of our lives to Christ."

"I suppose, now life will be all duty," said Pauline with a sigh.

Tryphosa smiled.

"That is not the way I read my Bible. Peter says, we must 'love the brethren,' and John, 'This is Christ's commandment that we believe and love,' because, 'he who loveth knoweth God,' and Paul, 'The love of Christ constraineth us.'"

"But I must do something, my lady."

"Don't fall into that snare little one. It is what we are, not what we do. The dear Christ wants us, not for what we do for him but what he does for us. Listen, 'He that abideth in me and I in him the same bringeth forth much fruit, for without me ye can do nothing.' 'He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty.' The first great thing for you now is to get your meaning."

Pauline looked puzzled.

"I do not understand, my lady."

"What are you going to stand for? How much better is the world to be for your having lived in it? The day is long past when people were satisfied with a Sunday religion. True Christianity means a daily concentration of purpose. Look at the men who have made their mark in the world. Reformers, inventors, discoverers, all men of a single purpose; and Paul says, 'This one thing I do.' Michael Angelo said, 'Nothing makes the soul so pure, so religious, as the endeavor to create something perfect, for God is perfection, and whoever strives for it, strives for something that is God-like. And remember, 'perfect has no clipped edges, no dreary blanks.' Little one, I want you to be a perfect Christian."

Pauline fell on her knees beside the couch and buried her face in the cushions.

"I am not worthy," she murmured.

Tryphosa laid her hand very tenderly upon the bowed head as she repeated in low triumphant tones: "I will greatly rejoice in the Lord, my soul shall be joyful in my God; for he hath clothed me with the garments of salvation. He hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels." "This is the will of God even your sanctification." "That you may be holy and without blame before him in love." "Be ye perfect as my Father in heaven is perfect." According to the measure of our capacity, that is the idea, just as the tiny cup may be as full as the ocean. But for this we must lay all upon the altar. There must be no closed doors, no reserved corners in our hearts. We must give Christ the key to every room, so that he shall be, not merely a guest in the guest chamber, but the owner of the house. Are you ready for that dear child?"

And Pauline answered humbly, "I want the very best God has to give me."

CHAPTER VII.

The beautiful summer had slipped away, and the glory of October was over the land. Pauline had crossed the borders and plunged, with all the zest of her thirsty soul, into the fair world of knowledge which lay stretched at her feet. Her three months of conscientious study had been of great service as a preparatory training, and now she was ready to enter the great world of knowledge which lay stretched at her feet. Her three months of conscientious study had been of great service as a preparatory training, and now she was ready to enter the great world of knowledge which lay stretched at her feet. Her three months of conscientious study had been of great service as a preparatory training, and now she was ready to enter the great world of knowledge which lay stretched at her feet.

A subtle sense of power stole over her.

Every part of her being seemed to expand in the congenial atmosphere. A brilliant future seemed opening before her enraptured gaze. The world should be the better for her life. God had endowed her with gifts. She would lay them at his feet. She would devote herself to the uplifting of her race. Already in imagination she heard herself spoken of as the gifted woman whose sympathetic and exquisitely modulated voice thrilled the hearts of the multitude. Already in imagination she saw her audiences spellbound under the magnetism of her eloquence as she strove to lift them from the torpor of their commonplace into a higher life. Life was magnificent! Poor Tryphosa, in her narrow sphere of pain, how could she be so happy!

Belle hurried along the hall and stopped at the door of the blue-draped chamber.

"My dear Paul, do you know we are all waiting? What have you been doing? If I could only get a snap shot at you now I should call it the 'Intoxication of Success.' You would make a splendid Jeanne d'Arc, with the light of high and holy purpose in her eyes, etc., but as this is the last Saturday in the year that we shall have the chance of a ride to Forest Glen and home by moonlight, I move that we postpone our rhapsodies until a more convenient season. The boys are waiting below with the horses, and the servants started long ago with the hampers. Even Gwen has been wooed by the beauty of the morning to accompany us, though I think there are about a dozen meetings on her calendar. Here is a letter for you, but you have no time to read it now."

"Have I kept you? Oh! I am sorry!" and catching up her silver-mounted riding whip, Pauline threw her habit over her arm, and ran down to where Richard Everidge held the handsome bay mare which had been her Uncle's gift. The letter she had tossed lightly on her table. It was from her father, but it would keep. There was never any news at Sleepy Hollow.

Aunt Rutha watched the merry party as they cantered off.

"How well Pauline looks in the saddle. We have been very fortunate in our adopted daughter, Robert."

"Yes, she is a sweet girl, and her passion for knowledge is just the incentive that our lazy little Belle needs. I only hope her father will never take it into his head to claim her again. She is a blessing in the house."

On and on the riders travelled through the exhilarating Autumn air until they stopped for lunch on the borders of a forest which Jack Frost had set ablaze and which glowed in the sunshine with a dazzling splendor of crimson and bronze and gold. The hours flew by, and when they started homewards the sun was sinking in majestic glory, while on the opposite horizon the moon rose, silver clear. Pauline's every nerve quivered with delight. It was a perfect ending to a perfect day.

When she went up to her room that night her eye fell on the forgotten letter. She opened it slowly with a smile upon her lips. Suddenly the smile faded and a cold chill crept into her heart.

"It has been such a happy day," she had told Aunt Rutha, as, after the merry supper was over, she had stood by her side in the soft lighted library. "Such a day, without a flaw!" And now it seemed to be fading into the past! And yet it was only a few minutes since Richard Everidge had climbed up after the spray of brilliant leaves she had admired, and she had been against the dark background of the night, even now they were for her on the table. She looked at him with a dull sense of pain.

"You have had a stroke, of some sort," the doctor wrote, "the doctor doesn't know rightly what. She is some what, but she can't leave her bed. The doctor is well, except Polly, who seems to be the doctor thinks her spine has been hurt. Mother had her in her arms and she fell."

"The shivered; was this God's 'best'?" The letter dropped from her hand and she sat for hours motionless, her eyes on every detail of the pretty, moon-like until it was indelibly engraved in her memory.

In the morning came she took the letter. Tryphosa. She could not trust to tell the others yet.

"The letter that looked up at her from the sheet were very tender.

"Child, are you satisfied?"

"What, my Lady?"

"Christ, and the life he has given you?"

"Satisfied. If it had been this other day she had been planning for herself that day before, how gladly she would have answered, but if it should be Sleepy she could she say 'yes'?"

"Her keen intuition, which had been opened by pain, Tryphosa divined the thought.

"I am going to give you a new beating," he said, brightly. "Blessed be God, for it is the grey angel of success."

"It is a hard Gospel, my Lady."

"Yes, but ease and victory are for the impatient. The Father loved the one who surrendered him to a life of Christ himself gave his chosen heritage of tribulation, crowned with sweet, bright gift of peace. It is the lives that ring the truest. The Father all through the Bible, 'Silver seven times,' and, 'Gold tried in fire and polished after the similitude of peace.' Have you ever thought of that involves? The finest diamond is the most cutting, and it is the diamond that reflect the light. It would have our lives a success, we seek not happiness, but harmony. 'Honey! with what, my Lady?'"

"Will of God, dear child. We are of one when God finds us. He puts us, with our great key-note Jesus, that we are like an eolian harp. The east winds make music in it, and the shrieking storm the music of all. But remember, little one, the 'joy of the Lord' which is the rainbow. We must sit in the sunshine and reflect the rainbow."

"Pauline spent upon her knees. 'How ridiculous!' exclaimed Mr. Davis the next morning, she announced to the family. 'I will send a servant by the early train, but it is not for you, my child, and he cannot spare you.'"

"The good of you to say that! But father has called me, I must go."

"Does not say anything about your letter," said Mr. Davis, as his eyes over the words.

"My heavenly Father, Uncle said simply; 'the message is a night.'"

"That they could not shake her, she hung about her tearfully, and Gwen protested, Aunt Rutha and her with sorrowful eyes, and Davis repeated that the very idea was ridiculous. He paced up and down with a red skin in his throat.

"I am come to say good-bye, my Lady," said she looked wistfully at the brave, the one, which she knew she should not see.

"No, dear child!"

"The given Christ the key, as you know I am under orders."

"Well I knew it would come. It is only we must travel by different roads, and meet at the end of the journey."

"But you never told me that my way to the Kingdom lay through Sleepy Hollow!"

"Surely not, dear child! It is not for me to do the work of the Holy Spirit. I knew you would hear his voice speaking to you from out the shadows by-and-by."

Pauline sighed.

"I have so longed for culture, my Lady, and now I must put it by."

"I am going to quote again. 'Blessed be drudgery, the secret of all culture.' Someone has said, 'Latin, and Greek, and music, and art, and travel are the decorations of life, but industry and perseverance, courage before difficulties and cheer under straining burdens, self-control and self-denial are the indispensable. It is our daily task that mainly educates us and the humblest woman may live splendidly.' And remember, dear child, a life like Christ's is the grandest thing in the world. Angels may well envy us the opportunity of living it, for God himself has lived it in Christ and rejoices to live it again in each of us. We should glory in the thought that our King allows us to be the mirror in which the world may see Jesus. May the Lord keep you as one of his 'hidden ones,' my darling, and make you to realize that he who 'holdeth the height of the hills,' spreads the hush of his presence over the valleys."

Then she drew her close in a long, last farewell.

Calvary's Fountain.

THE dying thief rejoiced to see
A fountain burst from Jesus;
Hear him cry, "Remember me!"
As he looked on Jesus.

CHORUS.

Oh! precious is the flow
That washes white as snow;
No other Fount I know--
Nothing but the blood of Jesus.

Jesus died for you and me,
Blessed, blessed Jesus;
Fearful groans on Calvary's Tree
Came from precious Jesus.

Now all ransomed nations sing
Songs of praise to Jesus;
And all heaven's arches ring
With the echo--Jesus.

Hallelujah! all is well!
Glory be to Jesus!
Saved from sin and saved from hell,
Thro' the Blood of Jesus!

An Octogenarian Pastor.

Newman Hall's Long Career of Usefulness—American Participation in His Church Building.

ONE of the most interesting churches in London is Christ Church in the Westminster district. Its graceful tower and spire, conspicuous above the surrounding buildings, are named the Lincoln tower, after our martyr President. The Stars and Stripes are wrought in the masonry, and the cost of the tower was largely defrayed by contributions from American Christians. The ex-pastor of the church is still more interesting than the building. He four years ago, after a ministerial career of fifty years, and was succeeded by Rev. F. B. Meyer, for whom he has a hearty admiration. Dr. Hall recently celebrated his eightieth birthday, when a meeting of his friends was held in London to congratulate him and express appreciation of his valuable services in the cause of Christ. Cordial letters were received from many eminent men of various denominations, declaring themselves indebted to Dr. Hall's preaching, or books, or inspiration and stimulus; and speaking in the highest terms of the benefits of his labors. Among them were letters from Gladstone, the Duke of Westminster, the Archbishop of York, the Bishop of Exeter, Sir George Williams, and a large number of clergymen.

Dr. Hall's speech in reply to the address of congratulation was full of interesting reminiscences of religious life in his early years of the century. He was born in 1816, and was converted when he was sixteen years of age. He almost immediately began preaching, his first audience being the hop-pickers who loafed around his native town on Sundays. He added at that time to become a journalist and had some experience in newspaper work. But at the age of twenty-one his business as a preacher had been so clearly delineated, that he was sent to college to prepare for the ministry. He graduated from the London University with high honors, and soon afterward accepted a parsonate at Hull, where he labored successfully for several years.

In 1854 he was invited to London to take the place of the work begun by the famous electric preacher, Rowland Hill. He accepted the invitation, which was all the more congenial because of its freedom from denominational control. It was emphatically Christ's Church with the utmost liberty as to minor differences. The Church of England liturgy was used, but there was no episcopal supervision, baptism either by immersion or sprinkling as the candidate preferred, was administered, and the polity of the church was Congregational. Dr. Hall's conception of his duty was to preach Christ as the Saviour of sinners, and he made that the chief topic of his sermons. With disputed doctrines and questions of scholarship he would have nothing to do. The church was always thronged, and a great philanthropic work was organized. Eighteen Sunday schools were established in various parts of London in connection with the church. Besides his pastoral work, Dr. Hall found time to write many books. One of them, entitled "Come to Jesus," has been translated into fifty languages, and four million copies of it have been sold. In his eightieth year he is still hale and vigorous, and preaches frequently. He attributes his good health to the fact that he has been sixty years a total abstainer, that he never smoked, and always retired early to rest, never working late at night or eating late suppers.

A Hindoo "Holy Man."

Saraswati, the Recluse of Benares—His Impressions of Christianity.

IN a recent letter from Benares, a missionary furnishes a most interesting sketch of a native whose piety and zeal have made him widely known. Swamiji Bhaskaranda Saraswati, he writes, is known all over his country as the "Holy Man of Benares," and his reputation has extended widely. He is a singular, and in many respects lovable, character. Sixty-three years of age, an earnest student of religion, and a constant reader of the Bible, he has sought to retain all that he deems pure and essential in every form of faith. He has repudiated caste, and lives the life of an ascetic. His house stands in a large garden, and is a substantial dwelling, but he sleeps in a small and low closet in the stone wall hardly larger than a dog-kennel, and straw forms his only bed. He usually goes half naked, and his slender frame is met by contributions from his numerous admirers. In spite of his lodgings he is a cleanly and wholesome-looking man, and so lean through abstinence that every rib in his body can be counted. He has been married but both wife and children are dead, and so ethical meditation absorbs most of his time. He claims to be free from all passions, having gained this state through thirteen years of penance. His mind has become so concentrated that at times he is wholly absorbed in the contemplation of God. He is credited with working many miracles. Once a boy tumbled a distance of 135 feet, and was taken up insensible. His father told Swamiji of the accident. Thereupon the sage touched a pot of water with his feet, and told the man to put some of the contents on the child's face, and he immediately recovered. At another time he cured a hopeless dyspeptic by telling him to eat, when he became strong and well. He also told a man that misfortune awaited him, and within a week his son died.

In virtue of such supernatural power and of his goodness, Swamiji is visited by throngs of his countrymen of all classes, and is actually worshipped. In a shrine in his garden is a white marble image of himself, the forehead stained yellow. He mildly deprecates this ascription of honors, and repudiates excessive praise. Christians who know him well affirm that they have observed evidences of dissatisfaction and unrest, and think that intellectually he is convinced of the truth of their religion. Pride, the love of praise, and the dread of persecution exert the influence over him that has been observable in the case of many other prominent Hindoos.

A Deadly Snake in a Temple.

Amid the ruins of many of the ancient cities of India, poisonous snakes, scorpions and other reptiles find safe hiding-places. White travelers in India very often take foolhardy risks. Recently an English naval lieutenant was visiting a planter, and making a collection of Javan reptiles. His only attendant was a sailor lad about sixteen, and these two, against all warning, went roaming the forests without a guide. In Choru, a ruined city, the lieutenant found a rich harvest, and killed a magnificent black jaguar, but an adventure with a snake ended his sport. One day he and the boy were under one of the long archways of the big temple, and, looking through the doorway of one of the dark chambers, saw something yellow in the far corner. Without a moment's thought he entered and gave the mass a punch with his cane. A tremendous hiss that fairly shook the walls was followed by an assault swift as the leap of a tiger, and the man found himself seized by a huge Bari snake, the most aggressive and dangerous of constrictors. His left shoulder was crushed in the brute's teeth, and quick as a flash a coil was around his body, and he felt the steel-like compression. But the courage of the boy saved his master's life. He had a heavy, sharp wood knife, and he struck the reptile two heavy blows just back of the head, the most vulnerable part of its body, because the thinnest. Its backbone was divided. The coil relaxed, but the powerful tail lashed out, breaking the boy's leg. It was two hours before they were found and brought up in a cart. The lieutenant's left shoulder was crushed beyond surgery, and the arm was useless. Both master and boy recovered after a spell of fever. The snake, a hideous object, black and yellow, was fifteen feet long.

Erysipelas.

55 Madison Ave., PLAINFIELD, N. J., Jan. 16, 1894
Dear Sir: I feel that I must tell you of a fresh triumph by the Electropoise. One we ago erysipelas developed in my face, under the right eye, and the swelling increased rapidly.
My face was much inflamed and the whole cheek swollen.
I used the Electropoise locally with hot water, and the effect was soon shown by a decreas-ing of the swelling. I used the Electropoise for four more nights and the trouble was entirely cured.
Yours fraternally,

Erysipelas.

WEST COMPTON, N. H., March 4, 1893
We purchased an Electropoise of you which I began to use about the last of August, 1892.
It has cured me of erysipelas of thirty years' standing, which came out in sores, or in spots, and then blistered if I chilled my face or hands. For the last ten years I was obliged cover my face with a shawl, if I went out of doors at any time from October till May, but I winter I have not needed to cover my face at all.
I have also been greatly benefited by it for liver, heart and bronchial difficulties. It I broken up the ague chills for my husband, and is a wonderful invention. Gratefully yours

 RE T. DE WITT TALMAGE, D. D., Editor.

LEBANON is the Syrian Switzerland. Its wide, double range of snow-clad mountains, its deep, gloomy gorges, its rushing rivers, half hidden among sheer rocks, from whose clefts they emerge to plunge madly down, in waterfall and cataract, to still lower levels, present a succession of scenes of unequalled picturesqueness. Nowhere else in the world, is such natural grandeur to be found. Travelers unite in declaring that Lebanon combines much of the peculiar majesty of the Alps with the sterner splendor of the Himalayas. Its highest and most celebrated mountain range is in Syria.

THE RIVERS OF LEBANON.

A Region of Grand and Awful Scenery—The Litany and the Bukah Valley, through which it Flows.

shed near ancient Baalbec, at an elevation of 3,600 feet, being separated only a mile at their sources. One of the rivers is the Nahr el-Asy (the ancient Orontes), flowing north, and the other is the Litany (the ancient Leontes), which forms the natural division of Syria and Palestine. It runs southwest of Hermon and after passing through a deep gorge, turns westward to reach the sea, north of Tyre. In the lower part of its course, it has scooped out of the rock a deep and narrow channel for itself—doubtless a work of many centuries. At a point called Burghuz, it is spanned by a natural bridge, and at various other places, antiquated stone-bridges overhang its swiftly-rushing stream, casting dark shadows into the waters beneath. One of those bridges—known as the Gissar el-Kardely—spans it at a bend of the stream where the scenery is peculiarly beautiful. This is the spot shown in our photographic illustration on this page. During the greater part of its course, the Litany flows west, through the romantic valley of Bukah, (the plain of Cœle Syria), at an elevation of 1500 feet, until it reaches the imposing ruins of the old castle of Kat-at-esh Shakif, near one of the passes to Sidon. In its lower part, the river is known as the Nahr el-Kasimeyeh. There are hamlets or settlements scattered which lies along its undulating surface, especially on the swampy lower levels.

Through the Bukah runs a post-road, following, to some extent, the course of the river Litany, and passing amid scenes of indescribable grandeur. Indeed, from the point where the river enters the Bukah till it breaks through the mountain chain, its entire course is through dark ravines and wild, rocky gorges, mountain-girt all the way. At several points it is hemmed in between banks of naked rock a thousand feet high, which are pierced by numerous caves. Sometimes the cliffs seem to meet overhead, and further on, the pent-up river bursts forth in a white torrent, leaping over rocks in its descent, only to be again lost in some frightful chasm below. The whole region is volcanic and gives evidence of the mighty subterranean forces that have, in some long past age, rent the great mountain chain in grand convulsion, and allowed the rivers of Cœle Syria, to force their the boundary of Palestine, and its twin eminences lie midway between Damascus and Sidon, and parallel to the coast-line of the Mediterranean, extending from north to south over two hundred miles. Lebanon, the western mountain range, is divided from Anti-Libanus, the eastern range, by the Bukah Valley. Through the valley flow two rivers, which have their watercourses throughout the Bukah valley; but the dwellings, with few exceptions, are mere mud hovels. This long, narrow valley is extremely fertile, though but partially cultivated. It is the breeding-place of fevers that are generated in the deadly miasma way through to the Mediterranean sea, instead of to their natural outlet, the Jordan.

Vegetation on the Lebanon range is scant, consisting chiefly of grass and low brushwood, but in the lower levels and the valleys it is more abundant. Sycamore, cedar, juniper, oak, locust and pine trees are scattered in clumps over the mountain-

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

MIGHTY HUNTERS.

A Sermon Preached by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., at Washington, D. C., on the Text: Gen. 10: 9, "He was a mighty hunter before the Lord."

Our day, hunting is a sport; but in the lands and the times infested with wild beasts, it was a matter of life or death with the people. It was very different from going out on a sunny afternoon with a patent breech-loader, to shoot reed-birds on the flats, when Pollux and Achilles and Diomedes went out to clear the land of lions and tigers and bears. My text sets forth Nimrod as a hero when it presents him with broad shoulders and shaggy apparel and sun-browned face, and arm bunched with muscle—"a mighty hunter before the Lord." I think he used the bow and the arrows with great success practising archery.

I have thought if it is such a grand thing and such a brave thing to clear wild beasts out of a country, if it is not a better and braver thing to hunt down and destroy those great evils of society that are stalking the land with fierce eye and bloody paw, and sharp tusk and quick spring. I have wondered if there is not such a thing as Gospel archery, by which those who have been flying from the truth may be captured for God and heaven. The Lord Jesus in his sermon used the art of angling for an illustration when he said: "I will make you fishers of men." And so I think I have authority for using hunting as an illustration of Gospel truth; and I pray God that there may be many a man to-day who will begin to study Gospel archery, of whom it may, after a while, be said: "He was a mighty hunter before the Lord."

How much awkward Christian work there is done in the world! How many good people there are who drive souls away from Christ instead of bringing them to him! All their fingers are thumbs—religious blunderers who upset more than they right. Their gun has a crooked barrel, and kicks as it goes off. They are like a clumsy comrade who goes along with skilful hunters: at the very moment when he ought to be most quiet, he is crackling an alder, or falling over a log and frightening away the game. How few Christian people have ever learned the lesson of which I read at the beginning of this service, how that the Lord Jesus Christ at the well went from talking about a cup of water to the most practical religious truths, which won the woman's soul for God! Jesus in the wilderness was breaking bread to the people. I think it was good bread: it was very light bread, and the yeast had done its work thoroughly. Christ, after he had broken the bread, said to the people: "Beware of the yeast, or of the leaven, of the Pharisees." So natural a transition it was; and how easily they all understood him! But how few Christians would take so well to the lesson how to fasten the truths of God and religion to the souls of men. Truman Osborne, one of the bravest of the old-time preachers, who lived in the West, had a wonderful way of doing this. He came to my father's house one day, and said: "Mr. Talmage, are all your children Christians?" Father said: "Yes, all but De Witt." Then Truman Osborne looked down into the fireplace, and began to tell a story of a storm that came on the mountains, and all the sheep were in the fold: but there was one lamb outside that perished in the storm. Had he looked me in the eye, I should have been angered when he told that story; but he looked into the fireplace, and it was so pathetically and beautifully done that I never found any peace until I was sure I was inside the fold, where the other sheep were.

The archers of olden times studied their art. They were very precise in the matter. The old books gave special directions as to how an archer should go, and as to what an archer should do. He must stand erect and firm, his left foot a little in advance of the right foot. With his left hand he must take hold of the bow in the middle, and then with the three fingers and the thumb of his right hand he should lay hold of the arrow and affix it to the string—so precise was the direction given. But how clumsy we are about religious work! How little skill and care we exercise! How often our arrows miss the mark! Oh, that there were more institutions established in all the towns and cities of our land, where men might learn the art of doing good—studying spiritual archery, and known as "mighty hunters before the Lord!"

In the first place, if you want to be effective in doing good, you must be very sure of your weapon. There was something very fascinating about the archery of olden times. Perhaps you do not know what they could do with the bow and arrow. Why, the chief battles fought by the English Plantagenets were with the long-bow. They would take the arrow of polished wood, and feather it with the plume of a bird, and then it would fly from the bow-string of plaited silk. The broad fields of Agincourt, and Solway Moss, and Neville's Cross heard the loud thrum of the archer's bow-string. Now, my Christian friends, we have a mightier weapon than that. It is the arrow of the Gospel; it is a sharp arrow; it is a straight arrow; it is feathered from the wing of the dove of God's Spirit; it flies from a bow made out of the wood of the cross. As far as I can estimate or calculate, it has brought down four hundred million souls. Paul knew how to bring the notch of that arrow on to that bow-string, and its whirr was heard through the Corinthian theatres, and through the court-room, until the knees of Felix knocked together. It was that arrow that stuck in Luther's heart when he cried out, "Oh, my sins! Oh, my sins!" If it strike a man in the head, it kills his scepticism; if it strike a man in the heel, it will turn his step; if it strike him in the heart, he throws up his hands, as did the Emperor Julian of old when wounded in the battle, crying, "O Galilee, Thou hast conquered!"

In the armory of the Earl of Pembroke there are old corselets which show that the arrow of the English used to go through the breastplate, through the body of the warrior, and out through the backplate. What a symbol of that Gospel which is sharper than a two-edged sword, piercing to the dividing asunder of body and soul, and of the joints and marrow! Would to God we had more faith in that Gospel! The humblest man, if he had enough faith in it, could bring a hundred souls to Jesus—perhaps five hundred. Just in proportion as this age seems to believe less and less in it, I believe more and more in it. Give it full swing, and it will pardon every sin, heal every wound, cure every trouble, emancipate every slave, and ransom every nation. Ye Christian men and women who go out this afternoon to do Christian work, as you go into the Sunday Schools, the lay preaching stations, and the penitentiaries, and the asylums, I want you to feel that you bear in your hand a weapon, compared with which the lightning has no speed, and avalanches have no left, and the thunderbolts of heaven have no power; it is the arrow of the omnipotent Gospel. Take careful aim. Pull the arrow clear back until the head strikes the bow! Then let it fly! And may the slain of the Lord be many!

Again, if you want to be skilful in spiritual archery, you must hunt in unfrequented and secluded places. Why does the hunter go three or four days in the Pennsylvania forests or over Raquette Lake into the wilds of the Adirondacks? It is the only way to do. The deer are shy, and one "bang" of the gun clears the forest. From the California stage you see, as you go over the plains, here and there, a coyote trotting along, almost within range of the gun—sometimes quite within range of it. No one cares for that; it is worthless. The good game is hidden and secluded. Every hunter knows that. So, many of the souls that will be of most worth for Christ and of most value to the Church are secluded. They do not come in your way. You will have to go where they are. Yonder they are down in that cellar; yonder they are up in that garret. Far away from the door of any church, the Gospel arrow has not been pointed at them. The tract distributor and city missionary sometimes catch a glimpse of them, as a hunter through the trees gets a momentary sight of a partridge or a roebuck. The trouble is, we are waiting for the game to come to us. We are not good hunters. We are standing in some street or highway expecting that the timid antelope will come up and eat out of our hands. We are expecting that the prairie-fowl will light on our church-steeple. It is not their habit. If the Church should wait ten millions of years for the world to come in and be saved, it will wait in vain. The world will not come. What the Church wants now is to lift its feet from damask ottomans, and put them in the stirrups. We want a pulpit on wheels. The Church wants not so much cushions as it wants saddle-bags and arrows. We have got to put aside the gown and kid-gloves, and put on the hunting-shirt. We have been fishing so long in the brooks that run under the shadow of the Church that the fish know us, that they avoid the hook, and escape as soon as we come to the bank, while yonder is Upper Saranac and Big Tupper's Lake, where the first swing of the Gospel net would break it for the multitude of the fishes. There is outside work to be done. What is that I see in the backwoods? It is a tent. The hunters have made a clearing and camped out. What do they care if they have wet feet, or if they have nothing but a pine branch for a pillow, or for the north-east storm? If a moose in the darkness steps into the lake to drink, they hear it right away. If a loon cry in the moonlight, they hear it. So in the service of God we have exposed work. We have got to camp out and rough it. We are putting all our care on the people who come to our churches. What are we doing for the thousands upon thousands that do not come? Have they no souls? Are they sinless, that they need no pardon? Are there no dead in their houses, that they need no comfort? Are they cut off from God, to go into eternity—no wing to bear them to light to cheer them, no welcome to greet them? I hear to-day, surging up from lower depths, a groan that comes through our Christian assemblages and through beautiful churches; and it blots out this scene from my eyes to-day, as by mists of a great Niagara, for the dash of the plunge of these great torrents of dropping down into the fathomless thundering abyss of suffering and woe! Sometimes think that just as God blot out the Churches of Thyatira and Corin and Laodicea, because of their sloth and stolidity, he will blot out American English Christianity, and raise on ruins a stalwart, wide-awake, missionary Church, that can take the full meaning of that command, "Go into all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature."

I remark, further, if you want to succeed in spiritual archery you must have courage. If the hunter stand with trembling hand or shoulder that flinches with instead of his taking the catamount, catamount takes him. What would come of the Greenlander if, when hunting for the bear, he should stand shivering with terror on an iceberg? What would have become of Du Chaillu Livingstone in the African thicket, with faint heart and a weak knee? When the panther comes within twenty paces of you and it has its eye on you and it has squinted for the fearful spring, "Steady then!"

Courage, O ye spiritual archers! There are great monsters in iniquity prowling around about the community. Shall not of the strength of God go forth to combat them? We not only need more heart, but more backbone. What is the Church of God, that it should fear to look in the eye any transgression? There the Bengal tiger of drunkenness prowls around, and instead of attacking how many of us hide under the church-pew or the communion table! There is some invested in it we are afraid to assault millions of dollars in barrels, in vats, in spigots, in corkscrews, in gin palaces with marble floors and Italian-top tables, and chased ice-coolers, and in the strychnine and the logwood, and the tartaric acid, and the nux vomica, that go to make up "pure" American drinks. I looked with wondering eyes on the "Heidelberg vat." It is the great liquor vat of Germany which is said to hold eight hundred heads of wine, and only three times in hundred years it has been filled. But I stood and looked at it, I said to myself, "That is nothing—eight hundred heads. Why our American vat holds ten million, five hundred thousand barrels strong drinks, and we keep two hundred thousand men with nothing to do but see that it is filled." Oh! to attack that great monster of intemperance, and the kindred monsters of fraud and uncleanness requires you to rally all your Christian courage. Through the press, through the pulpit, through the platform, you must assault it. Would to God that all our American Christians would band together, for crack-brained fanaticism, but for the Christian reform. I think it was in 17 that there went out from Lucknow, India under the sovereign, the greatest hunting party that was ever projected. There were ten thousand armed men in that hunting party. There were camels and horses and elephants. On some princes rode, and royal ladies, under exquisite housings, and five hundred coolies waited upon the trail and the desolate places of India were invaded by this excursion, and the rhinoceros, the deer, and elephant fell under the stroke of sabre and bullet. After awhile the party brought back trophies worth fifty thousand rupees, having left the wilderness of India ghastly with the skeletons of wild beasts. Would to God that instead of here and there a straggling going out to fight these great monsters of iniquity in our country, the million membership of our churches would band together and hew in twain these great criminals that make the land frightful with the Nearly nineteen centuries have passed since that day. "The Mount of the Beatitudes" has become a landmark in the story of the Christian faith. Its sides, scarred and seamed by time's ravages, still bear their annual tribute of lovely flowers and amid them, tall and queenly as ever, stands "the lily of the field," more richly robed than any Eastern monarch. Early this season, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD sent a representative to Palestine in the person of Rev. H. B. Greene, a skilled botanist, who with reverent care has gathered many of "the lilies of the field," choosing only the most perfect blossoms. These have been prepared, dried, pressed and conveyed to New York, where they have been handsomely mounted, each mount bearing a perfect, real flower—the actual blossom, from the land of the Saviour. The color, texture, and form, the spread of the purple leaves, and even the delicate stalk, have been admirably preserved. It is our purpose to present one of these mounts, each bearing a fine specimen of "The Lily of the Field," absolutely free, to each and every subscriber who will send us the names and mail addresses of twenty-five friends or acquaintances, who are not at the present time subscribers or readers of this journal, and no two of whom are members of the same family or household. The names should be plainly written and mailed to the Publisher of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, New York, and a "Lily of the Field" will be promptly forwarded. This opportunity is one not to be slighted as it affords all a chance to possess one of these flowers, a gift that could hardly be duplicated in a lifetime, except at great expense. Our illustration on this page, photographed from the flower itself, is somewhat less than natural size; but no photograph can reproduce the delicate texture, the rich color and the velvety softness of the leaves. Every mount will be sent under cover, all charges prepaid, to any address desired.

David King over Israel.

Sunday School Lesson for July 12. II. Sam. 5: 1-12. Golden Text, II. Sam. 5: 10. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

DAVID had learned to wait upon the Lord: his was the dignity and power of a patient spirit. The death of the brave Abner, which was practically the death-blow of the house of Saul, did not lead David to make any effort to gain the allegiance of the remaining tribes of Israel. Abner's last work before his life was taken by Joab, was to encourage the elders of Israel to make David king; they had received proof that the foul deed of Joab did not proceed from the king; they were thus favorably disposed towards David; but, even under such circumstances, he would not move a finger to take the matter into his own hands. The anointing of the Lord was not only on his head but also in his spirit, and he counted it no loss of time to wait the Lord's hour. At the same time we read of no punishment of Joab, although the circumstances were so exasperating, for David took all from God.

Two ill-advised men sought to hasten matters. The two sons of Rimmon thinking to curry favor with David, and that probably they would be rewarded, entered the house of Ishbosheth, and murdered him in cold blood. Having done so they cut off his head and carried it to David with the words, "Behold the head of Ishbosheth, the son of Saul, thine enemy, which sought thy life; and the Lord hath avenged my lord the king this day of Saul, and of his seed." But David, far from recognizing the hand of God in the murder of Ishbosheth, saw only the deed of wicked men who sought to attain their own ends, and the evildoers received for their reward the capital punishment which is God's word for the murderer: "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed; for in the image of God made he man." (Gen. 9: 6).

The Truest Kingliness was manifest in David for he was superior to all personal feeling, and he reigned for God. But God's hour came at last. Seven years had David reigned in Judah, and many years before had he learned to wait with the anointing of God upon him; unknown, unrecognized, but all the time learning in the school of God lessons which fitted him for his future rule. And now without his doing anything whatever to bring it about, with one consent "came all the tribes of Israel to David unto Hebron, and spake, saying, Behold, we are thy bone and thy flesh. In times past, when Saul was king over us, it was thou that leddest out and broughtest in Israel: and the Lord said to thee, Thou shalt feed [or rule] my people Israel, and thou shalt be prince over Israel." At last after so many years, the people who had sought a king after their own heart came to recognize a king after God's own heart. And now that all was ripe, and the king was prepared to reign, and the people to accept his rule, the elders of Israel anointed David king over Israel. What a lesson to us all to wait God's time until he has made everything ready! What a rebuke to fleshly energy which seeks to hasten and to force things!

The future reign of our Lord is being prepared, but he is waiting until the regal character is formed in those whom the Father has given him, and whom he is perfecting into one (John 17: 23), one full of the stature of the fullness of Christ. It is his purpose to unite them with himself, "I in them, and thou in me, that they may be perfected into one, that the world may know that thou didst send me, and lovedst them even as thou lovedst me." The education of David was much on the same lines as that of many who are seeking, day by day, to be made ready for the return of our Lord and for eternal union with him. The kingly calling and the anointing is theirs already, they are already "a kingdom, priests unto his God and Father" (Rev. 1: 6, R. V.), "they are already a royal priesthood" (I. Peter 2: 9), "the anointing which they have received abides in them" (I. John 2: 27). Nevertheless "the world knoweth them not, because it knew him not" (I. John 3: 1).

The attitude of Saul and his people to David, their ingratitude, their injustice, their selfishness, etc., drove God's anointed closer to him, and at the same time served to bring out in David a character of forbearance, of patience, of superiority to his persecutors, and to those who injured him, which had far more power over those around him, than the grandeur and outward show of Saul's court had over his followers. So is it also with God's future kings. The persistent misunderstanding of those around them, the constant imputation of wrong motives, the suspicion of wrongs intended, etc., are a continual school to those whose citizenship is in heaven. It takes time and practice, but above all, it takes a habit of waiting upon the Lord, and of taking all things from his own and loving hand, to perfect in us

The Patience of Christ.

How many there are who long that things should move more quickly, they long for some extraordinary blessing which shall deliver them once for all from self-seeking and self-pity. But Jesus himself was "made perfect through sufferings," and himself "learned obedience by the things which he suffered" (Heb. 2: 10; 5: 8). There is no better way for his disciples than the way which he has trodden.

David was yet a young man, only thirty years of age when he began to reign in Hebron, thus he was thirty-seven years of age when he began to reign in Jerusalem. Jerusalem, God's chosen city, was pre-occupied. The Jebusites, who had before possessed and inhabited it, had recourse to a stratagem by which they thought to keep a hold on the city. Knowing how David had forborne to slay Saul; how he had shown such magnanimity in the relations which he had had with all the house of Saul, and with Abner, who had formerly fought against him, they counted on his human sympathies, and filled the garrison with lame and blind people, thinking that such as David would never do any harm to a defenceless people such as they were. But they were not aware that David's movements were directed from a higher source and actuated by higher motives than fear for his reputation of forbearance and humanity. Such considerations would never be a sufficient ground to actuate a man led by God. How many there are who driven to do things, not by the direction of God in his Word, and by his Spirit's light upon the Word, but by the pressure of some person's opinion! "Ye were bought with a price;" become not bondservants of men!" (I. Cor. 7: 23). Having as they thought thus fortified their city, the Jebusites said to David, "Except thou take away the lame and the blind, thou shalt not come in hither." [or margin, R. V. Thou shalt not come in hither, but the blind and the lame shall turn thee away.] But a man who knew how to wait upon the Lord was not to be turned away from a purpose in which he was one with God. "Nevertheless David took the stronghold of Zion, the same is the city of David. And David said on that day, Whosoever smiteth the Jebusites, let him get up to the watercourse, and smite the lame and the blind that are hated of David's soul," or "that hate David's soul" [margin]. David hated God's enemies. God was indignant with the land of Canaan because of the iniquity which was practised there, and David took God's side and did not let even the most apparently righteous sympathy divert him from the straight line of doing the will of his God. Oh, how many of God's people cannot see quite straight because they are influenced by the opinion of someone whose good opinion they fear to lose! A man who lives constantly waiting upon the Lord is above all such influences. The subtle cunning of the Jebusites did not answer, the stronghold was taken and David as God's anointed, dwelt there. "And David waxed stronger and stronger," but not in his own strength, the secret of his strength was the same secret as that of Joseph's prosperity. "The Lord the God of hosts was with him."

THE TOWER OF DAVID

ALL things, says the proverb, come to him who can wait. After the tribe of Judah had proclaimed David king, he waited seven and a half years for the fulfilment of the promise that he should be king over all Israel. Strength of character is sometimes shown as much in waiting as in activity. Such a spirit of impatience as Jacob and his mother displayed when they expedited the fulfilment of a promise by deceit, would have prompted David to attempt the seizure of the kingdom by force. One of the most common temptations of life is to adopt improper means to attain some desirable end. When some prize is almost in the grasp, and all that is needed is a lie, or some other course that the conscience condemns, there comes a struggle between duty and inclination that is very severe and often disastrous. There is no boy or girl who will not be the safer for having the principle firmly fixed in the mind that sin is too high a price to pay for the greatest prize on earth. When Christ indignantly rejected the offer of all the kingdoms of the world for one act of homage, he set an example that ought to settle that principle for all time. David waited, believing that in God's good time the promise would be fulfilled. He had now to seek a more central capital. About twenty miles to the northeast, was a city within the borders of Judah, but nearer to the northern tribes, which was well-fitted to be the capital—a city whose name will be famous to the end of time. Built on the tops of a cluster of hills, with deep ravines barring approach on three sides, Jerusalem occupied an ideal site for the capital of the land. This city David determined to have for his capital. The Jebusites, who had regained possession of it after the partial conquest by Joshua, were so confident that it was impregnable, that they boasted that the blind and the lame could hold it against David. Josephus says they actually put a number of maimed men on the walls in derision. The city was conquered, but the stronghold on Mount Zion withstood his attack. It was to the northwest of Mount Moriah and separated from it by the Tyropoeon valley, a deep ravine at that time. It would appear that a secret way was found into it, probably through some system of water-supply, called "the gutter," in the Bible. To penetrate to the citadel through this subterranean passage was a feat of extreme danger, and David promised the man who succeeded in it chief command in the army. From Chronicles 11: 6, we learn that Joab won the honor. The citadel was taken, and David strengthened the fortifications. Mollo referred to was probably an earl work on the north side. The section of the narrative concludes with the pious ascription of David's success to the fact that the Lord had established him—a fact which men are apt to forget when they attain the summit of their fortunes.

Thinking David cannot come in. This had probably forgotten the secret way called "the gutter," or relied on David not finding it out. It is not safe to overconfident. Many a man who has been so sure of his own moral strength that he has had no fear of temptation, trial has been overcome through some approach by which he never expected enemy. Every man has some weak point in his character where he has need to be especially vigilant. There is a profound truth in the Greek fable of Achilles. We are told that his mother Thetis desiring to make him invulnerable dipped him in the River Styx. She immersed him completely, except his heel, by which she grasped him in the process, and there alone, according to the tradition, could a weapon pierce him. The phrase, the heel of Achilles, came to mean among the Greeks a weak point in a man's character.

The blind and the lame, hated of David's soul. This does not mean that David hated the blind and lame, but that he was exasperated by the taunt that he could be kept out of the fortress by these impotent defenders. One of the severest trials encountered in the spiritual life is when sense of duty is opposed by natural pride or affection. When an ungodly father, mother or wife entreats a man to do something his conscience condemns, or not to do something that he knows he ought to do, he would be so glad to yield to them if his higher duty did not require him to resist. He must steel his heart against his natural inclinations and obey God at the cost of giving them pain. A parallel passage that in which Christ said: "If any man come to me and hate not his father and mother, yea and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple." (Luke 14: 26) Christ did not require any one to be so undutiful and unnatural, but he did require his followers to be so intent in service that they would count as an enemy the dearest friend they had, if that friend hindered their spiritual progress. "I have been a faithful, loving, obedient wife," said a poor abused woman to her godless, dissipated husband; "you have made my life miserable; I have waited on you as if I were a servant; I have borne your taunts and abuse and blows and have never retaliated; but when you order me to stay away from church, I tell you plainly, I will not obey you. You may kill me, perhaps it is the kindest thing you could do, but I will not obey you." The man looked at the usually timid, shrinking creature in amazement and wondered where her courage came from. She did not hate him, but she was as firm as if she had done so.

David perceived that the Lord had established him. Kings are apt to think that it is they who have established themselves, or that their ancestors should have the credit. Few are willing to acknowledge that they owe the elevation to God, and must give account to him for their conduct. In this country we often speak of men as being "self-made," when they have had a humble beginning and have attained fame and fortune. One of these who in his prosperity showed his contempt for old friends who had not been so successful as he, and was even ashamed of his former father, was pointed out to a pious old minister as a self-made man. "Yes," he said, "I can well believe it. If God had made him he would have been a better piece of work." This very city of Jerusalem is associated with an acknowledgement of a similar kind to that of David at a much later date. In the time of the Crusades the city was captured by Godfrey of Bouillon, but Gibbon says he refused, when he entered the city in triumph, to wear any of the insignia of royalty, remembering that within those walls his Lord had worn a crown of thorns.

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A Bible-Loving President.

A NOTABLE avowal on the part of Paul Kruger, the President of the Transvaal Republic, is contained in the cable report of a recent interview. It appears that the Mayors of all the towns in South Africa resolved to wait the President and petition him to release the five leaders of the Uitlanders, who were convicted of inviting the Jameson invasion. Their sentence had already been commuted from death to imprisonment for fifteen years, and the Mayors decided to urge a further extension of mercy. Before, however, they waited on the President, he had decided to let the prisoners go on their agreeing to pay a fine of $125,000 each and give a promise to abstain from interference in politics. The Mayors did consequently no petition to present, but as the arrangement for the interview had been made, they changed the programme to an expression of gratitude to the President for granting their petition before it was presented. Oom Paul, as the President is familiarly called, received his visitors graciously and listened attentively to their address of thanks. In his reply, he said that he had only one authority to guide him and that was "that book," pointing to the large Bible lying on his table; it had shown him the direction to follow. The President throughout the trouble has acted in a way that commands his avowal. In spite of the provocation offered and the pressure of his people to have the prisoners punished in the most exemplary manner, he has shown mercy and magnanimity of a man who has learned from the Bible the duty of forgiving his enemies. Much has been written about President Kruger's lack of refinement and culture, but through all the negotiations he has proved himself a thoroughly capable and astute man, contented and honorable in his dealings and fearless in his devotion to duty. His private life is declared by those who know him to be that of a humble, God-fearing man, careful in his religious duties and giving family prayer regularly in his home. The illustration on this page shows him in the severely plain, unadorned church he attends in Pretoria. In spite of his distinguished position and the wealth of the Republic of which he is the head, the service retains all the simplicity of the Huguenot principles. Compared with the magnificence of rulers of less important states, the life of President Kruger seems very unassuming, but it is well the people he rules, as it has been for men who have found mercy at his hands, that he knows where to seek that all-wise wisdom which is represented by the wise king as saying:

By me kings reign and princes decree justice.
—Prov. 8: 16.

The Sagging Gates.

The correspondent at Newport, R. I., of the New York journal, reports a millionaire's disappointment over a recent purchase. A pair of magnificent gates have been ordered for Mr. Vanderbilt's mansion there, called "The Breakers." They are exceptionally beautiful and were made expressly and at a great expense for their position. But when they were set in place it was found, after a few days that they would not close. The upper edges of the gates overlapped fully two inches, showing that the posts to which they were attached were out of plumb. The posts consist of blocks of granite laid one upon the other, and are not supported by any guy-rope or mechanical arrangement to keep them upright. As each gate weighs two and a-half tons, the burden on the posts is enormous and the swinging of the gates has drawn the posts inward at the top. The gates consequently cannot be closed. The mechanical experts who have charge of the work are said to have decided that their lighter gates must be used, or the posts from which they hang must be strengthened, or supported in some way. At present they sag under the weight that is beyond their strength. Something like this often occurs as to moral character. A large business, or a great fortune inevitably tends to drag earthward the man to whom it belongs. He can be saved only by drawing nearer to God and clinging firmly to him.

Charge them that are rich in this world that they be not high-minded nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God. (1. Timothy 6: 17.)

Lost at his own door.

A singular bewilderment on the part of a belated diner-out is described by a San Francisco journal. It states that a convivial citizen was observed by a policeman making his way homeward in the early hours. He was evidently under the influence of liquor, but as he was not disorderly, the policeman did not interfere with him. He turned into the street in which he lived and went somewhat unsteadily down the block. The houses in the street are exactly alike, and the man being conscious apparently of not having full control of his faculties, looked attentively at the numbers on the transoms to be sure of going to his own house. At one of the houses he came to a halt and seemed about to enter, but on looking up at the transom he turned away and went on down the street to the end. He returned on the opposite side, but seemed to be utterly confused. Finally, he went back to the house at which he had halted and sat down disconsolately on the stoop. There the policeman found him and asked the cause of his trouble. The man said he was lost, but thought this was his home, but his number was 206 and this was 509. The policeman looked up. "Oh!" he said, "this is all right. This is 206, but the transom has been turned over." That proved the true explanation and the man gratefully accepted it and went in. He would not have needed the policeman's help in solving the problem, if his faculties had not been disturbed by drink. Prejudice operates to a man's detriment in a similar way. Like drink it affects the perceptive faculties. Many a man is outside a church home, who might find comfort and kindness inside, if it were not that its name, or some unimportant article of its creed, made unduly prominent, leads him to think that he would not be welcome.

Why dost thou judge thy brother? Why dost thou set at naught thy brother? Let us not judge one another any more; but judge this rather that no man put a stumbling-block or an occasion to fall in his brother's way. (Rom. 14: 10-13.)

Miners Entombed.

Press dispatches from Helena, Montana, report the narrow escape from death of a party of miners in the Eureka mine at Rimini, a small mining camp in the mountains. The men were at work in a part of the mine known as the four hundred-foot level, and three hundred feet away from the shaft. Without the slightest warning a vast mass of rock believed to weigh over a hundred tons, fell between them and the shaft, completely blocking their way out. They were caught in a trap four hundred feet below the level. To make matters worse, water was flowing into the mine. Happily their situation was known to their comrades on the surface and every man lent willing aid to the work of rescue. Fifty strong arms plied pick and shovel and there was no cessation to their efforts for twelve hours. At the end of that time a passage way sufficiently large for a man to crawl through had been made in the rock and one by one the men crawled through to light and life. The water was then nearly three feet deep in their prison and they were almost stifled by the foul air. The men had no words strong enough to thank their rescuers for their escape. So men feel when, after realizing their lost condition and that the way to eternal life is barred by their sins, they discover that Christ has made a way for them.

A new and living way which he has consecrated for us through the veil. (Heb. 10: 20.)

Panic in the Schools.

Three of the public schools of New York were the scenes of panic recently. On June 18, eleven hundred girls were in the play-room of the school in Rivington street and were talking about the devil having visited a school on Broome street, when one girl, with a piercing shriek, declared that she had just seen the devil with have to dread, but the subtle, attractive guise in which temptation will approach them. Still more is it important to give them the assurance, for which there is Scriptural warrant:

Resist the devil and he will flee from you. (Jas. 4: 7.)

Wrecked in the Night.

News of an appalling catastrophe comes from the coast of France. On June 16th the steamer Drummond Castle on its voyage from South Africa to London, struck on the rocks off the island of Ushant and sank in a few minutes. Only three of the two hundred and forty-seven persons on board are known to have been saved. The first news of the disaster came from the light-house keeper at Ushant, who telegraphed that the steamer struck on a rock, and went down in three minutes. The British war-ship Sybil was near the scene of the wreck and lowered her boats to go to the rescue of the drowning, but could save none of them. Two seamen who managed to secure a plank and a panel-raft, floated about on these frail supports, until some fishermen saw them and took them on board their boat. Another man, a passenger, is reported to have reached Ushant. The sailors say there was a fog that night over the dangerous passage between Ushant and the Molene Islands. The passengers were chiefly women and children. The children were asleep below and the adults were on deck, watching for the first sight of the English coast. Suddenly there was a prolonged scraping followed by silence. The fore part of the ship plunged downward. The Captain, who was on the bridge, ordered the boats lowered, but before the order could be executed the vessel plunged beneath the waves. She went down, they say, like a piece of lead. Maritime men think that the vessel must have been a long way out of her course, either through an error in reckoning, or owing to the fog. The passage she took is an extremely dangerous one. A lighthouse has been placed there, but its light on the fatal night was hidden by the fog. To many of the poor drowned creatures, one may hope, the terrible disaster was but the way by which they would reach their heavenly Father's house. It would be infinitely more sorrowful if any of them found it only the prelude to eternal disaster, which every one may escape if in the voyage of life he will submit to the guidance of Him who is called the Captain of Salvation, and who has said:

Of them which thou gavest me have I lost none.
—John 15: 9.

Electrified Bullets.

A remarkable discovery is reported in a Swiss journal. It appears that during the recent rifle contests at Thun, the marksmen were astonished at the deviation of their bullets. Though they were remarkably good shots and used the Swiss model rifle, firing steel bullets, not one struck the bull's eye in the target. Piqued by this, to them, unusual result, an investigation was made. It was found that the bullets had all struck the target to the right of the centre. Various theories were suggested in explanation of this fact. At last, the theory was broached that the bullets had been deflected by the electric and telephone wires suspended on the right of the rifle course. Confirmation of this theory came from the fact that the bullets extracted from the target proved to have become magnetic. A practical test of the theory was then made. Several electric wires carrying a current of eight thousand volts were fixed beside the track at a distance of forty yards and artillery and rifle practice was resumed. It was found that in both cases the missiles were deflected in their course, and followed the wires with absolute servility. A further proof that the electricity was responsible for the erratic fire was furnished in the fact that leaden bullets were not affected; only the steel bullets responded to the attraction. The erratic course of Christians in this life may sometimes be accounted for in a similar way. The Church and the world are surprised when some prominent church-member is found to be a defaulter, or to be guilty of some other crime, but it is generally discovered that there was some trait in his character as responsive to a strong temptation of a peculiar kind as the steel bullets are to electricity. Blessed is the man who can, like his Lord, say in the presence of temptation:

The prince of this world cometh, but he hath nothing in me. (John 14: 30.)

PAUL KRUGER, PRESIDENT OF THE TRANSVAAL. AT CHURCH.

Another Chance.

THE man about whom this story is to be told, died five years ago, full of years and honors. The story is true. It is the story of a man who would have been fatally wrecked in character, in reputation, in opportunity, had not a Christian woman's faith and love insisted on giving him another chance.

What is the matter, dear husband?" said Mrs. Goodrich as she observed the occupied looks and troubled manner of the gentleman in question. "You are eating nothing, and I made these muffins myself, and planned the nicest supper I could think of to refresh you after your journey." "I will tell you by-and-by, my dear," said Mr. Goodrich, with a glance at the lie ones who were seated at the table. "Something has distressed me to-day, and I will have no rest till I have gotten it off my mind. Pardon me for not doing justice to the meal. Everything is very nice, but I have no appetite."

Listening with a brief plea to be excused, Mrs. Goodrich went to his library. As soon as the children were dismissed, the young ones to their evening studies, and the younger to bed, the wife sought her husband. He was sitting at his desk, his head bowed on his hands, his attitude that of profound depression.

For pity's sake, Robert, tell me what is the matter?" exclaimed the lady. "Have you had bad news from home, and are you hiding it from me? Or have you been with losses? Whatever is the disaster, Bob, dear, let us share it together."

"Sally," said Mr. Goodrich, "I have been with an irreparable loss. One that I cannot share with me or help me to bear. I have lost my confidence in young Gerald Watts. We have had reason to think that there was a thief in our employ some time, the accounts have been tampered with, and I have privately been slyly the case up. To-day it was proved to my satisfaction beyond the possibility of doubt, that Watts has been systematically robbing me for over a year. Watts! Mom I have treated with so much indulgence, a boy well brought up, a country boy, with such a mother as his! I am indignant beyond expression. Not for the money, remember, though nobody likes to be cheated, but that such a fellow, with such fine abilities, should stoop to stealing. In my mind. He'll be arrested to-morrow. He's safe to get a good long sentence when the case is tried. Such an offender must be made an example of."

Robert!" "Now, Sally, it's useless to look at me with such pleading eyes. If you cried for me, I'd do my duty in this matter." "But, husband, Gerald Watts is very young, only twenty years old." "A man who is a thief at twenty should go to the penitentiary, Sally. A striped suit and prison fare will teach him that the way of the transgressor is hard." "Think of his poor mother!" "He is the one who ought to have thought of her."

He may have had bad companions, Robert. Temptations may have found him unguarded; having begun, he may not have known where to stop." "Sally Goodrich, I tell you once more I will not change my decision. Watts will be arrested to-morrow morning." "Suppose, dear, it were our own Harry, given to Gerald's age, and fallen into sin, would you not wish mercy to be shown him, tell me that."

"I cannot for an instant," said the husband, coldly, "fancy your son and mine in such a situation." "Nor could you have fancied Alice Watts' son in such a one. Darling," and the wife's brown eyes, full of tears, confronted her husband's obstinate blue ones. "I have seldom asked a great favor of you, but I do now. For the sake of our own dear children, do not sadden me by a refusal. Give Gerald another chance. Let me talk to him."

Mr. Goodrich yielded. "You desire to be his surety, if he shows penitence and a disposition to do right, and make restitution?" "Yes, husband, I do."

"Then, please God, if Gerald shows humility, and promises improvement, I'll accept you as his security."

The next morning Mr. Goodrich sent Gerald Watts on an errand to his home. The boy, as the merchant noticed, was pale and had a hunted look. He started when suddenly addressed, and his movements were furtive.

When he reached the home of the Goodriches, he was shown to Mrs. Goodrich's own private sitting-room. There he had a long and very earnest conversation. Afterward, when she related the incidents of that talk to Mr. Goodrich, she said that Gerald put his head down on the arm of the sofa, and sobbed and sobbed, like a child who has been punished, and cannot overcome his weeping.

"But at last I prayed with him," she said,

"SIX COOLIES CARRIED ALL THAT WAS MORTAL OF AN AGED COREAN WOMAN."

"and I have commended him to God, to the God who says, 'Cease to do evil, learn to do well, and though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as wool.'"

Gerald Watts went straight to his employer and confessed the whole shameful story of the first dishonesty, of the accumulating thefts, of the burden of horror, and the chain of fear he had borne. Mr. Goodrich forgave him, accepted his offer of service without salary, allowed him to pay up his debt. Nobody ever knew, outside the immediate family, the story of Gerald's sin and of his repentance.

Years passed, and, rising from one step in advance to another, the youth became a partner in the firm. He was prominent in municipal and church affairs. He did good with a liberal hand. He was noted for his kindness to the young and friendless, and his readiness to extend a helping lift to those in need. The widow and the orphan never applied to him in vain.

He had been forgiven. One of Christ's followers had treated him in a Christ-like way. Gerald Watts had had another chance.

Christian Work in Corea.

Missionary Malcolm C. Fenwick writes of that Country's Spiritual Condition—Strange Customs and Superstitions.

COREAN FISHERMEN.

REV. Malcolm C. Fenwick, who lately returned to his missionary post in Corea, has written us a very interesting letter (accompanied by illustrations by a native artist) descriptive of the spiritual state of that country. As may be gathered from the letter itself, the field for Gospel labor is a most inviting and needy one. Any reader who may be disposed to assist Mr. Fenwick's work or to learn further particulars regarding it, should address him at Wonsan. His letter is as follows: WONSAN, COREA, April 1, 1896.

The waters of the Pacific are crossed and also the Sunrise Kingdom with the waters lying between her and this "Land of Morning Calm," whose bleak hills once more look down upon me. As I write, seated on a stone brought from the hill-sides to form the mound on which my native sarang (reception-room) is to stand, twenty-four idle men surround me, looking on, while three men on the other do the work of excavating. I had been telling them of Jesus, and just finished an entreaty for them to take hold and work, but all without effect. I then told them I would sit down and write a letter to my friends at home, advising them how Coreans have fallen and with work. So here I am to fulfil my word and tell your read-dered but is in hiding. Her murderers have slain the Chinese, too, for nought, as the King is safely housed in the Russian legation in Seoul, the pro-Japanese ministry dissolved, and one after the King's own heart formed. Thus Russia has quietly and unostentatiously secured the supremacy over Corea. Notwithstanding all this, the country looks just the same as when I left it a year before the war. The mountains still out-distance the eye, the coo-coo sings in the hedges, the robin red-breast builds as of old her nest in the scrubby fir trees, and the meadow lark soars just as high and sings just as sweetly as ever. Neither has sin been removed. The devil remains still unbound—still roams about to withstand the supremacy of Jesus. But, praise God, he is being foiled here and there.

Last Lord's Day (April 5), in company with Dr. Harder, I had the joy of seeing the shackles broken off seven sin-bound souls. Some had heard of Christ for years, some for months, one for one week, and two for the first time. Praise God, heathenism does not harden souls; it is committing that awful sin beside which all others are but nought, which hardens hearts—rejecting God's beloved Son.

"THOSE SORROWFUL DRUMS."

One of these seven—a poor, hard-working coolie—called around next morning, and, questioned, said: "I have eaten a new heart and am very joyful."

Hearing one of their sorrowful drums beating as we conversed, I asked: "What is that?" "The devil," was his reply. "A man is dying." "Do you worship the devil?" "Not since Sunday." "Why? You have straw and paper, and rags, and pine branches (all emblems of demon-worship) around your house, as all Coreans do, have you not?" "No, not now." "How's that?" "I threw them all away." "When?" "After I went home on Sunday." We say, "praise God!" and wonder.

This morning, while preparing to oversee the construction of the little dwelling to be known as "Jesus' House," an old familiar sound broke on my ears—a weeping and wailing for some one gone before. In a few minutes, a bier left the house near by. About six coolies carried all that was mortal of an aged Corean woman.

THREE MEN TO ONE SHOVEL.

an. The weeping and wailing were enough to touch the hardest heart.

I had gone but a little way down the road when I met another heathen funeral—another immortal past redemption, another priceless soul gone to eternal doom. My heart is heavy as I write. Have I done all in my power to tell these perishing ones of Jesus? Cordially yours for Him.

Exercise Overdone.

SO much is said about the importance and necessity of bodily exercise, especially to people of sedentary habits, that many carry the good advice to extremes. When I was a young man, Dr. Todd, Dr. Lewis, and Dr. Comb, sometimes set the student wild on the subject of physical exercise. He wakes up to the fact that he has been wickedly neglecting it, and resolves then and there to begin. He buys a bat, or calisthenic clubs, or dumb-bells, and opens the sanitary struggle. In most cases, he immediately overdoes it, and, for a time, is worse off than if he had remained lethargic.

Soon after entering the ministry, we were reading, one day, on the importance of physical exercise. The subject flashed upon us so overpoweringly that we resolved on a gymnasium in the garret of our country parsonage. We speedily extemporized such an institution, and, with coat off and slippers on, began exercise. We ran, and jumped, and swung, and lifted, and climbed, and took frightful positions. Several times there was a knock at the door, and fears expressed for the demolition of the parsonage. But we dislike to stop after we have started in anything. So we kept on jerking away at the pulleys and walking the horizontal bars, and bending over backward till our head touched the floor, and had gone through all the varieties of somersault. The second day our exercise was excruciating, because of sore ligaments and muscles. On the third day we resigned forever the duties of that particular gymnasium. We sat two days with our feet upon a pillow, in a state of disgust with all those who had written on the subject of sanitary conditions. We doubted whether physical exercise was of any advantage after all. It certainly had been a damage to us. Against all the learned advocates on the other side, we have before us two immovable arguments in the shape of two crippled legs. We would have continued that quiet position still longer, but Sunday came. It was time to get up. Getting to church was one of the most difficult enterprises we ever conducted. We went early, for the pulpit was to be climbed, and we did not desire to be late. The sympathy of the audience. There was no one in church but the sexton, and we watched till he went to ring the bell before we began to climb the sacred hill. The six steps seemed like the sides of the Matterhorn for difficult ascent. The first step up we took sidewise, the second backward, the third by a strong pull on the banisters. We then stopped to rest and wipe the perspiration from our brow, all flushed with the manly achievements of the last five minutes. Nothing but the fact that we were half-way up, and that it would hurt us as much to go down as to go up, encouraged us in the work of ascent. But the last two steps were stimulated by the sound of advancing feet in the vestibule, and an indisposition on our part to create unseemly mirth in church, or to tempt any one to irreverent laughter at an ambassador from the skies. The audience coming in were surprised to find their pastor so early waiting for them. If we had that day taken the text nearest to our heart, it would have been Paul's advice to a young man by the name of Timothy: "Bodily exercise profiteth little."

We learned by these experiences that anything overdone had better not be done at all. Gymnasiums are grand things; but let common sense dictate quantities and qualities, and do not allow the dumb-bells to drag down the shoulders, nor had you better hang by your feet to a ring till you get black in the face. Fencing is good; but do not be rough, nor play with loafers. Pedestrianism is healthful; but do not forget that the road back is a little further than the road out, though it may be the same road. Hunting is good, if you do not shoot sparrows, nor go to sleep on the edge of a marsh. Rowing is good, if you do not take a bottle in the boat, nor pull so hard that you get aneurismal trouble with the heart. When we forsook the fitful and extravagant use of gymnastics, and came to their gradual and intelligent use, we found them, next to religion, the best panacea for all earthly ills. We have put down all the burdens of a life-time at the door of the gymnasium, or hung them on the horizontal bars, or demolished them with the butt end of dumb-bells, or fastened them as so many Mazeppas to the wooden horse bounding off the precipices of forgetfulness. Let not, therefore, the wretched muscles and swollen foot of the Belleville parsonage trip up any one on his way to the gymnasium. Only do not take so much of anything at once that you cannot take any more of it again. Moderation is a big word, which it takes some of us a long time to learn how to spell.

Donation Parties.

HIS congregation had kept him on a small salary, which they did not pay. Noticing that their minister's overcoat was getting shabby, and his wife looked very much troubled, the good people met together and resolved to atone for the past by giving him a donation party. The night came, the sleighs drove up, the people stamped the snow-clods off their heels, and the party began. The most of us had not eaten much during the day, in order that our appetites might be sharp and keen. Some had brought smoked beef, and others bread, and others cheese, and others tea, and others coffee, and others turkeys and cheese. The few liberal souls who brought largely and generously ate but little, and demanded no thanks; but we who had brought twenty-five cents' worth of provision ate fifty cents' worth, and we who had brought forty cents' worth ate nearly to the amount of one dollar, taking away in our handkerchiefs for the children at home enough to make up the full dollar. The carpets, which ought to have been replaced three years ago by something better, were about finished that night by the tramping of several hundred feet. We broke a lamp and dropped one tray-full of the crockery of Mr. and Mrs. Starved-to-death. We left, when we came away, many pieces of fruit-cake with the raisins picked out. Our horses had eight quarts of the minister's oats; for we had come a long way. We left the dominie ten or fifteen book-marks, more than enough to put on the empty plates of the parsonage someday when the fare is short. We added to the minister's library some fine copies of the "Patent Office Reports," which had been franked us by our Congressman in Washington at public expense. We ran our elbow through a pane of glass, which will help in the ventilation of the parsonage when the weather is warm. And now, if any man in all the world ought to be happy and grateful, it is Dominic Starved-to-death. Let others, if they will, support their pastors by contributions of money, which has been the ruin of so many people; but improving on the words of the orator, we cry, "Give us donation parties or give us death."

Striking the Bull's-Eye.

WE are much interested in the games, or contests of the marksmen frequently reported, and when our American marksmen contend with the foreign marksmen, we always hope our side will beat. Would it not be wise for us who stay at home, and who have other targets to shoot at, and other cartridges to load, to be studying how to be skilful and felt in our departments? We want more spiritual workmen. We have enough ammunition and enough rifles, but we are very apt to miss our aim. The marksmen practiced a long while. Missing the target, they felt chagrined; but we go on year after year in our Christian work, feeling but little disturbance though we make a very poor score. We all need to study skilfulness in taking aim. Let us be improving our faculty as spiritual marksmen. "They do it to obtain a corruptible crown, but we an incorruptible." They shoot balls of the right calibre; but some ministers shoot cannon shot weighing nearly half a ton, while others use rifle balls, and some bird-shot. But it is not always the calibre that does the work. A spiritual mustard-shot that hits a man is better than a theological rifle shell which goes whizzing away in the air, exploding in empty space and not even frightening a chicken.

More Water.

WE approach a delicate subject. We must be cautious, for fear we make some of our readers mad. The world needs more careful ablution. We judge that many people do not wash themselves often enough and thorough enough. In city houses, with bath-rooms, and water pipes running everywhither, there is no shade of excuse for lack of cleanliness. Indeed, there is no excuse anywhere for neglect of ablution. You answer that you wash your hands and face every morning. What of that? Your hands and face could get along without immersion easier than the rest of your body, for the dirt would rub off by contact with fresh air and the implements of your occupation. You need frequent application of water from the top hair of your head to the end of the long toe. Once a week will not do. God washes the flowers every night with dew, and you are certainly no purer than the jasmines and verbenas. Three-fourths of the world does not wash often enough either for health or decency. With three-fourths of the world water, the plan of frequent purification ought to be everywhere adopted and acted on.

Unless assistance speedily comes to Crete, that unfortunate island will probably be the scene of Turkish atrocities, equalled only by the terrible massacres in Armenia a year ago. Turkey is sending large bodies of troops thither and the situation is represented as deplorable. Greece, alone, is giving evidence of sympathy and is aiding the Christian women and children to leave Crete. Already, villages have been seized and depopulated by the Turks. It would certainly seem as though "the half furious madman, whom six Christian Powers still permit to shed Christian blood"—as the newspapers of the Greek capital describe Abdul Hamid—were not yet satisfied with the enormities he has committed. Canea, the capital of Crete, and at present the scene of great excitement, is shown in the illustration on the opposite page.

Her descendants have numbered 80, whom 700 have been traced from youth by Pellmann. Of these, 7 were convicted of murder, 10 of crime, 10 were professional beggars, 10 on charity, and 181 women of the family led reputable lives. From the Year Book of the International Committee of Young Men's Christian Association just published, it appears that there are now Associations with an aggregate membership of 200,000. The number of Secretaries and other agents has increased from 1850 to 1880, with the same vacancies to be filled. There are 100 Association buildings (an increase of ten during the year) valued with other real estate owned by the Associations at $18,180,300. Other property owned by Associations will almost equal the value of the buildings. 25,887 different young men attended educational classes, an increase of over 100,000. 10,000 young men were sent for 1885-1886. There has been an increased attendance during the year at both the Bible classes and the young men's meetings of the Associations.

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

P. Prentiss, Chillicothe, O. With regard to the proposed Armenian immigration plan, what progress has been made by those interested?

None whatever. The plan is rendered inapplicable by the recent absolute refusal of the Sultan's government to permit Armenians to leave his dominions. The Porte has even refused to allow the missionaries to find homes for the orphan children of the Armenian Christians who were massacred last winter.

M. Field, Albany, N. Y. Why should there be a shortage in the money necessary for missions? Are not the Christians of America able to financially push the Master's work if they so desired?

They are unquestionably, but the world too often stands between them and their duty in respect. It is stated by a statistician that eight billions of dollars in money, lands, jewels, works of art, etc., are hoarded and lying idle in the hands of professed Christians in America. Many good people are doing their duty nobly and voluntarily, fully realizing that they are stewards and servants, with a high moral responsibility. Others unfortunately, do not appreciate this great truth and so are cold and unresponsive to the call of Gospel service. They prefer the dross of earth to the treasures of heaven and are in the position of the man with the sack-rake described by Bunyan, who, with eyes bent on the ground, continued to gather rags and dirt, although the shining One hovered above him with a crown which he might have secured had he only dropped the rake and reached upward for it.

W. J. F., Cape May, C. H., N. J. You say that Baron de Hirsch was not of the Jewish faith; what faith or creed did he believe in?

His sympathy with the Jewish race, which he showed so strongly, was as a race and not as co-religionists. He was not a professed professor of any creed, but if we may infer anything from his life and actions, he cherished the broadest humanitarian views and was a philosopher and lover of all mankind. Lord Beaconsfield, the English Premier, occupied practically the same attitude as Baron Hirsch toward the Jewish race and faith.

L. Smithtown, N. Y. Do you not think the Revised Version of the New Testament could be improved by using "who" for "which," when speaking of God?

The Revisers have not attempted to modernize the English of the Holy Scriptures although the American Committee strongly urged it. He changes they made related more particularly to the text of the translation, which they were enabled to improve in many places, roughly having the advantage of recently found manuscripts and inscriptions excavated in Palestine, Syria and Egypt—none of which were at the service of the King James' revisers. In all cases, the old Saxon form has been retained, except where the exigencies of the new translation affected it.

From a reader in New Canaan, Ct., comes this letter (one of thousands like it), which shows what one dear, good Christian soul may do to spread the Gospel in her own circle:

The Bible was received safely. This is the third Bible I have received from you and presented to my dear grandsons. I am an old woman, almost eighty-nine. My sands of life are nearly run, and I am now going to a country of which I know but little, and my trust is in my Heavenly Father, and I know that all is well.

Subscriber, Belmont. 1. What do the letters "cir," placed before so many of the dates on the margin of the Bible mean? 2. Which one book of the Expositor's Bible Series would you advise me to get first, if I can only afford to get one at a time? Have any of these books ever been offered by THE CHRISTIAN HERALD as a premium? 3. In Num. 16: 32, we find, "And the earth opened her mouth and swallowed them up, and the houses and all the men that appertained unto Korah." Yet in Num. 26: 11, we are told "the children of Korah died not." Who then were "all the men" who were destroyed?

1. They are a contraction of the Latin word, "circa" (about or approximately), indicating that there is no means of ascertaining the precise date of the occurrence. 2. There are thirty volumes issued, among the ablest being that on Job, and that on Ezra, Nehemiah and Esther. The best way might be for you to select the volume dealing with your favorite Book. Those that deal with the Gospels would probably be of the greatest practical service. None of them have ever been offered by us as premiums. 3. It would appear that Korah and his associates in the rebellion, to "the number of 250 men," perished, but that the children were not involved in the dreadful punishment. Josephus, the Jewish historian, in chapter 2 and 3 of the "Antiquities," gives a full history of the conspiracy, doubtless compiled from the most ancient Hebrew sources. Nowhere is it stated that the women or children perished.

Reader, New Rochelle, N. Y. When was Cyprus ceded to England and under what conditions?

June 4, 1878, was the date of the "Convention of Cyprus." It was in reality an alliance offensive and defensive, in which England pledged herself to support the integrity of the Sultan's territories in Asia. In the event of Russian encroachment on the Ottoman Asiatic dominion, England engaged to join forces with the Sultan in resisting such encroachment. In return, the Sultan consented to assign Cyprus to be occupied, and administered by England, and he also pledged himself to introduce reforms throughout his empire for the better protection of his Christian subjects.

Constant Reader, Hudson, N. H. Does the word "brother," in 1 John 3: 10, refer to the natural relationship, to Christians, or to the whole world?

You remember that when Christ was asked the question "Who is my neighbor?" he replied by relating a parable in which the question was turned on the questioner. He was invited to ask himself who the people were to whom he was willing to be a neighbor. Brotherhood is a closer term but of the same order. "All ye are brethren," Christ said (Matt. 23: 8). In the passage you mention, probably fellow-Christians are primarily intended, but the limit need not be observed. In one sense every man is a brother and in need of our love.

J. T., Portsmouth, Va. Is it pleasing to God to have memorial windows in a house dedicated to God? Would it not take the glory of God from the same? Is there any part of God's Word that will sanction it or condemn it?

There is nothing in the Scriptures that either approves or condemns such a practice. Memorial windows or tablets that are erected to commemorate the piety and consecration of some servant of the Master, now passed away, are not inappropriate in the Lord's house, and they are a reminder to those who still worship there of the beautiful and faithful souls whose lives are worthy of emulation, having been spent in God's service. It has been a custom for many ages and seems entirely appropriate that any distinguished service voluntarily and self-sacrificingly rendered to the Church of God, should be so commemorated, not by the doer of the service, however, but by posterity. For a servant to vaunt himself would be a vulgar offence, whereas a grateful remembrance by those who live after so far evidence in favor of his authorship. No one, however, supposes that he could have written the last chapter of Deuteronomy, describing his own death. Whether other chapters are by different authors cannot now be discovered. The general impression among Biblical scholars is that his work consisted mainly in detached records and memoranda and the code of laws. These scattered manuscripts, with others, were woven into the form in which we have them by another hand at a later date. Such expressions as "Before there reigned any king over the children of Israel" (Gen. 36: 31), seem to have been written at a time long subsequent to Moses. Some Biblical scholars place the date as late as Ezra. Others contend that Moses wrote all the five books practically in the form in which they have come down to us. Christ's references to "Moses and the prophets" indicate that Moses was at that time regarded as the author.

Inquirer, Salem, Ore. Are wicked thoughts an evidence that a person is not a Christian? Where there is unbelief and a tendency to atheism, is it a sign of the Holy Spirit having taken his departure, so that it is no use seeking Christ?

Very much depends on the mental constitution. There are some minds of a morbid character, given to introspection and gloomy views of things. With such people evil thoughts are no sign of being lost. Some of the best men have had them. The proper course, in such cases, is to ask God to forgive them; and as speedily as possible get about some active, useful work. Relieve some poor family, visit some one who is sick and lonely, or do some kind, self-denying act. That is a capital mental tonic. On the other hand, if you have honest mental doubts, it is best to investigate the matters that trouble you, praying earnestly for light and guidance. You may be quite sure that God will keep his promise to save those who believe on his Son.

E. B., Lancaster, Pa. When the Jews appealed to Jesus to tell them plainly if he was the Christ (John 10: 24), why did he not do so?

Probably because he understood their motive in asking the question. They wanted evidence on which to arraign him for blasphemy and he did not wish to supply them with it. His ministry would have been cut short. His works proved that he was the Messiah and they should have accepted him.

"Daughter." So, Dak. Some time ago I wronged a friend very badly by word of mouth. I have repented and have asked forgiveness for the wrong. She tells me it is too late now. Is it ever too late to be forgiven? What must one do in such a case?

If you have fully and honestly expressed contrition and asked forgiveness, it is probable that you can do no more. It is impossible in many cases to undo the wrong. That is the terrible consequence of sin. You can so seldom avert the results of hasty words or acts. Perhaps your friend suffered irretrievable injury by your words. If you can do anything in the way of atonement, you should do so. Then you have done your part. The responsibility rests with your friend. If she still refuses to forgive, the sin is hers. But you must seek forgiveness of God, against whom you sinned when you did the wrong.

J. M. T., Grandview, Ill. Is an elder justified in handing the elements at the Lord's Supper to persons who are not members of any church?

There may be exceptional circumstances which would justify him, but as a general rule confession of Christ before men should precede participation in the Communion. Christ did not organize a church with ritual and a system of church polity. That was done after his ascension. His idea in instituting the sacrament seems to have been that his followers who loved him should meet together to commemorate his death and show their brotherhood with each other.

Constant Reader, Washington, D. C. We are exhorted to give tithes, but is not every dollar we have the Lord's to be used for his glory?

The Christian is not under law; but that does not release him from the obligation to give to the Lord's work. His greater privileges would suggest that he should give voluntarily at least as much as was compulsory under the Jewish law. But he is not limited to a tenth, and as a matter of fact, many give a larger proportion of their income. There is the utmost freedom under the Gospel, but the more a man imbibes its principles, the more he will give of his own free will to propagate it.

THE PORT OF CANEA, ISLAND OF CRETE.

Scene of the Troubles between the Turks and the Cretan Christians.

erhood is a closer term but of the same order. "All ye are brethren," Christ said (Matt. 23: 8). In the passage you mention, probably fellow-Christians are primarily intended, but the limit need not be observed. In one sense every man is a brother and in need of our love.

J. M. M., Cornwall, Mo. 1. Does the reference to Melchisedec in Heb. 7, imply that he was an angel or a supernatural being in some way? 2. Is it right to play the violin in church?

1. No, the writer was representing Christ as priest and king, and he referred to Melchisedec as an illustration of the combination of the two offices. He showed that as Abraham gave him tithes he recognized his priestly character and so Levi, through his ancestor had confessed the validity of an order of priesthood beside his own. Having neither father, mother, etc., simply means that his pedigree about which the Levitical priests were so strenuous, was unknown. As people say now of a man of humble birth "he was a man of no family."

2. Why not? If a harp was used with God's approbation, there is no reason why a violin should be excluded.

W. L. Crossman, Boston, Mass. Can private property in land be squared with the command, "Thou shalt not steal?" Can private property in land be justified according to Leviticus 25: 23, and Psalm 115: 16?

Ownership of land, acquired through settlement, gift, inheritance, or purchase, has been a recognized principle ever since the world began. It is recognized in many passages in the Scriptures (see Deut. 19: 14 and 27: 17; also Prov. 22: 22-28 and 23: 10, and Job 24: 2). These passages indicate that, in the most ancient times, the just ownership and use of land were sustained alike by the moral and civil laws. But this approval is nowhere extended to include unjust ownership, or monopoly, the adding of field to field, or the extension of our possessions beyond our own natural and reasonable needs, and to the detriment of others. Land so acquired and held is unrighteously possessed. The soil is intended for the use of all God's children, and not to be monopolized by a few; but nowhere is it to him, may be considered appropriate. Indeed, any memorial erected in a vain-glorious spirit, or to satisfy the desire for mere show, is a vanity and a desecration.

W. B. D., Mackey's Ferry, N. C. What were the names of the two thieves who were crucified with our Saviour?

They were supposed to be robbers and members of the lawless brigand bands then infesting Palestine and they had probably been captured and imprisoned at the same time with Barabbas. According to an old tradition their names were Demas or Dismas and Gestas, the former being the penitent. Still another names them as Titus and Dumachus, the former the repentant thief, while a third account, mentioned by Bede, gives Matha and Joca as the names. The first, however, has been most generally accepted, and St. Dismas has a place in Syrian, Greek, and Latin hagiology.

Z. M. B., St. John, N. B. Has time, place, or manner of conversion anything to do with its reality? What is the true test? Is it in the present or in the past?

There is endless variety in real conversions as to all the matters you mention. Men have been really converted in church, in the field, in the home, in all ways and times. The true test is in the life, in fact, the only test we can apply. God who sees the heart may judge differently, but we are obliged to judge by the life. There are, however, different standards. We have no right to expect the same conduct from the man who has been brought up in a wicked home, and the man whose parents gave him pious training from infancy. We have a right to expect a change and that the whole tendency of his soul shall be Godward. There should be kindness and love of all men and hatred of sin, and where we see these we have the right to infer that the man has been born again.

G. M., Middletown, Conn. Is it known for certain what books of the Bible Moses wrote?

There is now no way of obtaining absolute proof. The fact of the first five books being continually ascribed to him by the Jews is Enthusiasm in Service.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor topic for the Week Beginning July 12.
 Acts 4: 13-33.

A Idle Christian is scarcely a babe in the religion of Christ. One wonders how a man who has once even tasted of the feast Christ spreads for his people can be silent about it. The very essence of Christianity is a constraint of service. The love for mankind that is one of the first signs of the renewed heart, leads longing to impart the knowledge that has brought happiness. All motives unite to impel speech. Because we love Him we want to bring subjects to his kingdom; because we love men we want to make them happy with the joy that has filled our own hearts. All the enthusiasm grows. The man who has had the joy of leading a soul into the light, who has led another there and whose hunger for conquest is insatiable. The religion of Christ is spiritual energy. To be saved or eternity is not enough. To be saved from sin is not enough. The unselfishness that springs up in the heart that Christ has entered longs for the salvation of others. No matter what denomination a man belongs to, if he have the spirit of Christ in him he must be out his Master's business. This is one of the great objects believed by Christian Endeavor—that it gathers men of every age from the churches and places them in a dynamic organization. The men of the Christian spirit, the men who are in the Church for their own benefit, the men who are there to work, can enlist under its banner and become active forces in the cause of Christ. We sometimes forget that every generation must be judged by its own standard. The fathers pass away and the new generation comes on the stage to take their place and in spite of the overwhelming, the world is all new. It depends on Christ's people that each generation should be saved. If they are such as the Holy Spirit can use, if they are eager to live the Christ life, anxious to let their light shine, to win souls, then the coming generation will be permeated and energized with the divine life. But if they are worldly, their chief concern is to make money, if they are seeking amusement in the places where youths enjoy themselves, the cause will languish and the next generation will be more worldly than the present. The thought of such a catastrophe ought to inspire every lover of the Lord with untiring energy. Every circle whether it be large or small should feel the influence of the Christian who is in it. If it be the home only, or the workshop, or the store, the Christian is bound by the principles of the Master to make his influence felt, as far as it will reach. If the spirit of man is the candle of the Lord, that candle should burn brightly; otherwise there will be some darkness who ought to have had the light. The enthusiasm that sends a man into the foreign missionary field ought to be in every soul that has the hope of the Gospel. The opportunity to preach to the heathen, or the ability to do so, may not be given, but the spirit should never be quenched. If we really apprehend the principles of Christ, if we really perceived that this world would be if those principles dominated the life of the nation, the family, and the individual, and if we had in the love of humanity that we ought to have—the enthusiasm of service would be the chief element of our lives. No desire would be so strong as that for labor.

Reunion in Heaven.

SURELY our Father holds our loved and lost,
 Safe in His sheltering hand till we shall meet.

Until that blest reunion,
 Its sweet communion,

The joys of heaven, to them, are incomplete.

Our Father formed those hearts,—to hearts responding

In the sweet mystery of deathless love.

In pain of separation,
 Gives bright anticipation,

Of meeting and reunion, in the home above.

Oh precious hope! abundant compensation,
 To meet again, and know as we are known;
 To part again? No never!
 But in the great Forever,
 To live and love:—and worship Jesus on his throne.

We shall be satisfied at that glad meeting,
 And, wondrous thought, we shall be like our Lord:
 Shall see Him in his glory,
 Of his love, repeat the story.
 And dwell enraptured, on His every word.

The Closing Dispensation.

Signs in Government, in Society, and in the Church that the Dispensation is Ending.

BY REV. H. GRATTAN GUINNESS, D.D. *

AS the four great Gentile kingdoms foretold twenty-five centuries ago, [See Dan. 2: 36-45] have in turn arisen and run their predicted courses, so the foretold fifth kingdom, "the kingdom of the God of heaven," which already exists in a spiritual form in the hearts of the regenerated, shall be revealed in an outwardly visible and glorious form, to destroy the corrupt "kingdoms of this world," and establish the prevalence of universal righteousness and peace. "Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father." (Matt. 13: 43.)

Prophecy foretells a glorious and eternal future, for the earth has yet to be inhabited by the perpetual generations of a redeemed and holy humanity. In the writings of the prophets of the Old Testament, and in those of the apostles of the New, and especially in the sublime visions of the Apocalypse, the new heaven and earth of the future are set before us, and the New Jerusalem is seen "descending out of heaven from God,"—"that great city," "having the glory of God" in whose light "the nations of the saved shall walk," into whose places "the kings of the earth" shall "bring their glory and honor," whose gates shall never be shut, and where God's servants "shall see his face," and bear his name upon their brows, and shall "reign forever and ever." While beholding in vision the descent of the New Jerusalem into the new earth, we hear the final utterance of a great voice out of heaven saying, Behold, the Tabernacle of God is with men, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them, and be their God; and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be any more pain; for the former things are passed away. And he that sat upon the throne said, Behold I make all things new." (Rev. 21: 3-5.) What is the date of the present year? The reply to this question reminds us of the fact that the most civilized nations of the world reckon their dates from the birth of Jesus Christ. The times of all events which happened before his birth are measured from the date of his nativity, and denominated B.C. or, Before Christ; while the times of all events which have taken place since his nativity are distinguished as A.D. (Anni Domini), or are reckoned from the year of our Lord. Thus the chronological usage of the most civilized nations of the world recognizes the Advent of Christ as the centre of human history.

In A.D. 70, the year of the destruction of Jerusalem, Jewish sacrifices having continued with only one short intermission for 1,600 years, finally ceased to be offered. Since that terminal date the Jewish people have remained without an altar, without a priest, without a temple, without a prophet, without a king, without a land of their own, exiles and wanderers among the nations. Caesar's Roman Empire was the last and greatest of the world's empires. Seven centuries were occupied by its growth to universal supremacy, and fourteen centuries more by its decline and fall. No efforts to reconstruct it succeeded.

CHAPTER VIII.

If you cannot realize your ideal, you can at least idealize your Real."

As the train slackened speed Pauline lifted her eyes from the book which Richard Everidge had laid on the seat beside her, after giving her that last strong handshake, to see her father standing in front of the Sleepy Hollow station. A great pity filled her heart—how worn and old he looked!

They had all wanted to accompany her a part of the way, and Belle had pleaded to be allowed to go and help nurse, but she had said them nay. She knew the accommodations of Hickory Farm, and it was easier to leave them where she had met them first, at the entrance of what would always be to her the City of Delights.

Abraham Lincoln and the spring wagon! Had the whole beautiful summer been one delicious dream? Could it be only a week since she had stood entranced at that forest of flame? Here the leaves hung brown and shrivelled on the denuded branches, stray flakes of snow were in the air, and the early twilight fell chill and dreary.

"I'm terrible glad to see you, Pauline, though I hated to spoil your visit," said Mr. Harding, as he gave Abraham Lincoln a taste of the whip.

Pauline leaned toward him and laid both hands upon his arm.

"Poor father! I am so sorry for you! Now tell me all about it."

And the tired man turned gladly to the daughter who for his sake had left ease and beauty and friends, and shifted to her shoulders the burden which he found too heavy for his own!

The children crowded to meet her as she stumbled through the narrow hallway into the kitchen. How dark it was! Her quick glance comprehended the whole scene, and the contrast between it and that other home-coming smote her with a keen sense of physical pain. She looked at the solitary lamp with its grotesquely hideous ornament of red flannel, at Susan's expressionless, freckled face, at the boys in their copper-toed boots and overalls, at the good natured, but hopelessly common-place, Martha Spriggs, with her thin hair drawn tight into a knob the size of a bullet, and her bare arms akimbo. "Idealize her Real!" Would it be possible to idealize anything at Sleepy Hollow!

She got her welcome in various fashions.

"It's about time you were gettin' back!" exclaimed Mrs. Harding from the bed, where she was forced to lie, in bitterness of spirit, with Polly by her side. "I suppose nothing less than a stroke would have brought you. It beats me how people can be such sponges. I'm thankful I was never one to go trailin' about the country after my relations. I never was away from home more than a day in my life till I was married, an' it's been nothin' but work ever since. An' now to be laid here like a log, with every thing going head-foot to destruction! It's a good thing you've come at last, for the children are makin' sawdust an' splinters of every bit of crockery in the house, an' that Martha Spriggs has no more management than a mule. I don't suppose you'll be much better, though. You never did have much of a head, an' now you're up among the clouds so long you'll be more like to sugar the butter and salt the pies than before."

Pauline lifted Polly from her uncomfortable position, and laid her on the bed, her heart which all the sick woman's words had been beating. If she could see Richard Everidge she would tell him she did believe in altitudes now. It was possible even in the valleys to live above the clouds.

"Do not seek happiness," Tryphosa had said, "but harmony with God's will," and God's will for her was Sleepy Hollow. "It is not what we do, but what we are, dear child," she seemed to hear her saying. She remembered reading that "the smallest roadside pool has its water from heaven and its gleam from the sun, and can hold the stars in its bosom as well as the great ocean." God could make a "perfect Christian" even in Sleepy Hollow.

"I'm powerful glad yer've cum, Pawliney," said Martha Spriggs, as she followed her into the dairy after the meal was over. "I'm that beset I don't know where I'm standin', for Mis Hardin's been as crooked as a snake fence an' as contrary as a yearling colt, an' the children dew train awful."

"Yer've got to tell me stories all night, miles of 'em," said Lemuel, as he bestowed his small corporealism on the floor with his legs in the air.

"No, no, Lemuel, you're going right to bed like a good little brother, so Polly can get to sleep. Poor Polly is so tired." And Pauline walked up and down the floor of her room trying to soothe the weary child.

"Hi! Poll's no 'count; she's only a girl. I ain't goin' to sleep, nuther. I'm goin' to stay up fer hours an' hours, an' if yer don't keep right on tellin' stories quick, I'll holler, an' that'll make Mar mad, and then she'll send Par up with a stick ter beat me. I don't care, he don't hit ez hard ez she duz, anyhow."

"If you'll get undressed right away, Lemuel, I'll tell you about a little boy who lived with an old, old man, and one night he couldn't sleep, but—"

"Huh! that's a Bible story. This ain't Sunday. Par never reads the Bible 'cept Sundays. I want 'em 'bout lions an' tigers, an' men tumblin' down mountains, an' boys gettin' eat up by bears."

"What did you do when I was away, Lemuel?"

His lower lip protruded ominously. "Aint had nuthin'. Martha Spriggs don't hev any. She only knows the 'Cow that jumped over the moon,' an' that's no good, t'aint true, fer our cows don't do it."

No time the next morning for the long hours of delightful study. It was churning day, and there was baking to be done, and the mending was behindhand, and the children needed clothes; besides the numerous "odd jobs" which Mrs. Harding's illness had deferred, but which she was prompt to require done as soon as she had someone besides Martha to call on. Then her meals must be given to her, and nothing tasted right, and the children were so noisy, and the older boys so uncouth!

Wearily Pauline toiled up the narrow stairs with Polly as the clock struck nine. She laid the sleeping child on her bed softly, so as not to wake Lemuel, and knelt down by the window. Not a sound broke the stillness. Her thoughts flew to the blue draped chamber, and the soft lighted library, where she could almost see Uncle Robert and Aunt Rutha, and Belle and Richard, and Russell and Gwen. But they might not be there yet, they had set apart this night, she remembered, to run over for a look through the big telescope. Last week that was, before she had decided to come to Sleepy Hollow, and broken up all their happy plans. Only last week! Then she thought of Tryphosa, lying with closed eyes in her darkened room, waiting patiently for the sleep that so often refused to come, while the Angel of Pain brooded over her pillow. Then her eyes sought the stars.

"You dear things!" she whispered. "God put you in your places and told you to shine, and for all these hundreds of years you've just kept on shining. Oh! my Lady, ask God to help me to make this dark place bright."

She knelt on in the clear, cold moonlight till at last the hush of God's peace crept into her heart, and there was calm.

The winter crept on steadily, Jack Frost threw photographs of fairyland upon the windows and hung the roofs with fringes of crystal pendants, while the snow-flakes piled themselves over the fences and made a shroud for the trees, and every day Pauline, with this strange peace in her heart, did her housework to the glory of God.

There were bright spots here and there, for the Boston letters came freely, and the magazines which she had liked best, and now and then a book, as Belle said, "to keep Mr. Hallam company." They would not let her drop out of their life, these kind friends, and she took it all thankfully, though she could only glance at the magazines and never opened the books. There would be time by-and-by, she said to herself cheerfully. There was so much waiting for her in the beautiful "By-and-by."

"It beats me," said Mrs. Harding fretfully, as Pauline hushed Polly to sleep, "what you do to that child. I used to sing to her till my throat cracked, but you just smooth her hair awhile with those fingers of yours, an' off she goes. I wish you'd come an' smooth me off to sleep. I'm that tired lying here, I don't know what to do. That new Doctor's no more good than his powders are! I don't see what old Dr. Ross had to die fer just before I was goin' ter need him," and the sick woman groaned. Pauline laid Polly in her cot with a smile. This grudging praise was very sweet to her. To make darkness light, that was Christ's mission, and hers. She was putting her whole soul into the effort.

"What makes P'liney so different?" queried Leander of Stephen and John, as they rested from their daily task of cutting wood. "She used ter be as mad as hops if yer mused up yer clothes, an' now she only laughs an' sez, 'Never mind, if it's a stain that soap will conquer.'"

"An' she's always singin', too," said John thoughtfully; "if mother didn't scold so, it would be real pleasant."

"I'd like to know why it is though," repeated Leander thoughtfully.

"Because she belongs to the King," said the clear, sweet voice of his step-sister from the doorway; "and she wants you all to belong to him, too."

When she went back into the house she found Lemuel brandishing a broomstick over the frightened Polly.

"Why, Lemuel! what are you doing?"

"I've casted the devils out of her," exclaimed that youth triumphantly, "an' they've gone into the pig pen, whole leguns of 'em, an' they're kickin', orful!"

CHAPTER IX.

The Gray Angel.

Seven years had gone by, and every day of each successive three hundred and sixty-five had been full to overflowing of hard work for Pauline.

"Dear Tryphosa," she whispered to herself with a smile, "you little thought, when you gave me that new beatitude, what constant friends the gray angel of Drudgery and I were to be."

She climbed slowly up the narrow stairs to her room, and shaded the lamp that it might not disturb Polly's troubled sleep—poor Polly, who would be an invalid for life! Then she sat down with a sigh of relief to read Belle's last letter. It had been a hard day, her stepmother had been more than usually restless, and the farm-work had been very heavy, for Martha Spriggs was home on a visit, every nerve in her body seemed to quiver with the strain.

"My dearest Paul!" Belle wrote, "I can hardly see for crying, but I promised her that you should know at once."

"Tryphosa went away from us to 'the other shore' last night. We were all there,—her 'inner circle,' as she used to call us,—all except you, and she seemed to miss you so. I never knew her to grow fond of anyone in so short a time, but she took you right into her heart from the first. If I had not loved you so much I should have been jealous, but who could be jealous of you, you precious, brave saint! I have heard of the gate of heaven, but last night we were there. Dick was supporting her in his arms,—poor Dick he was so fond of her and it was so hard for her to breathe,—and we were all gathered round her, our hearts breaking to think it was the last time. She has suffered terribly lately, but at the last the pain left her and she lay with the very rapture of heaven on her dear face, talking so lightly of how we should do after she was gone. It was just as if she were going on a pleasure trip and we were to later. She turned to me with her eyes all aglow with joy and said:

"Give my Bible to the dear child in the valley" (that was what she always called you) "and tell her 'the miles to I are but short and few.'"

"She had a message for us all, and suddenly, just as the dawn broke, the light swept over her face and she her head and whispered, 'Jesus! I was gone, I shall never forget it. I always thought of Death as the King of Terrors, but last night it was the King of the Bridegroom for his own.'"

With a low cry Pauline's head drooped. There could never be anyone just like her, and she had gone away.

The hours passed silently as she sat numbly in the grasp of her great sorrow. Suddenly she sprang up. Her father calling her from the foot of the stairs, "Mother's had a bad turn; send for the Doctor and come quick!"

She hurried down and mechanically heated water and did what she could for the stricken woman, but before the Doctor could reach the house the Angel of Death had swept over the threshold, and Pauline and her father were left alone.

"Here's a letter for yer Pawliney, yer wish yer may git it?" And Leander the irrepressible, waved it at her, taking it from the top of the tall chimney where he had perched himself, like a monkey that he was. She saw the B postmark and stretched out her hand for it, longingly.

"Bring it down; there's a dear boy!" "Not much! I bet Leander that I make you mad, an' he bet his new knife that I couldn't. I'm goin' to it up. It's awful thin, taint any anyhow. You won't Miss it P'liney, and crushing the letter into a small ball he put it into his capacious mouth."

It was, as Lemuel said, "awful thin, not much like the volumes which he usually wrote. She had not been able to distinguish the writing, but of course must be from Belle. The two cousins grown very near to each other as they rolled by, and a summer never passed without some of her Uncle's family spending a week or two in Sleepy Hollow. Those were Pauline's red letter days, bright scintillating points where she brought into touch again with the world of thought and light and beauty."

"Throw it down to me, Lemuel!" "Can't," said the boy coolly, "I'm ter tie it to Poll's balloon, and let go the string and then it'll go straight to heaven and with the letter reposing in his clasp he began to sing vociferously:

I want ter be an angel,
An' with the angels stand—
A crown upon my forehead,
A harp within my hand.

Git mad now P'liney quick, fer I've that knife orful."

A cry from Polly made Pauline hurry into the house to find that Martha Spriggs had slipped while passing the child's couch, and upset the bowl of scalding milk, which she was carrying, right on the little invalid's foot. In the confusion which followed, Pauline forgot Lemuel and her longed-for letter. When she went out to look for him, he was gone.

"Give it to me now Lemuel," she said, as he came in to supper, "you've enough fun for to-day."

"Can't, P'liney. I used it fer a gun to shoot a squirrel with, an' the cat eat the squirrel, letter an' all. Yer don't want ter kill the cat, do yer, P'liney?"

"Oh, Lemuel," she cried softly, "how could you! How could you do it?"

She sighed sorrowfully. She had tried so hard to make Lemuel a good boy, nothing seemed to touch him, and, you as he was, the neighbors had begun to blame of every misdeed upon his shoulders, and Deacon Croaker predicted with a mournful shake of his head, "good will ever come to Lemuel Hardin. He's a bad lot, a bad lot."

"Sing to me," cried Polly, "the pain awful!" and taking the weary little form in her arms, Pauline sang herself back to her usual happy trust.

She would not tell Belle her letter had been destroyed. She must shield Lemuel from the blame.

The St. Louis Convention.

In a recent issue, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD presented the portrait of the candidate of the Prohibition Party for President of the United States, with a sketch of his career. Today, it gives the portraits of the candidates chosen by the Republican Party at the recent National Convention at St. Louis. On that occasion, Hon.

Garrett A. Hobart, the Republican candidate for Vice-President, is fifty-two years of age, and is a native of New Jersey, having been born in Long Branch, in that State, in 1844. He was educated at Rutgers' College, studied law, was admitted to the bar, and in 1871 was City Counselor of Paterson, N. J. From that time forward his political advancement was rapid, and he became an influential participant in politics, being elected successively a member of the State Assembly and Senate and President of the latter body during two terms. Mr. Hobart, however, has also been interested in mercantile pursuits, and has been a successful manager of large properties, railroads, banks, etc., where legal knowledge and business ability were needed. He is President of the East Jersey Water Company, and has also governing interests in various other concerns, including gas companies, banks, railroads, electric lighting companies, and manufacturing large gilt idols now worshipped in China there greater part owe their bright appearance to Siberian gold. When the army was sent which captured this image, (the first mentioned by Chinese writers), at the chief seat of Tartar worship, it was not the earliest seat of worship. The powerful Emperor, Chinshihuang, had driven the Tartars away from the "Mountain of the Sweet Spring," a few miles to the north of the ancient Chinese capital Shangan, on the Ching River, where they had long maintained their worship, in a rich agricultural country.

No One Can Fill Your Place.

"Among so many can he care,
Can special love be everywhere?"

"Still I am something fashioned by thy hand."

AMID the myriad souls
That throng life's strange, sad way,
And go with hurrying feet

Through all the burdened day,
There comes a whisper sweet,
"The Lord still cares for you,"
His hand hath made and given
The work for you to do.

"No one can fill your place."
Oh, 'tis a happy thought
To know God's loving hand
My life hath hither brought.
He made and placed me here—
Lowly, I'm something still,
The work of hand Divine,
To do the Father's will.

Whatever lies before,
Within my path of life,
God wishes me to do.
To conquer in the strife,
None other may my work
Do for the blessed Lord,
None other bear my cross.
None hear for me his Word.

Then let me faithful be,
Listening to hear his voice,
A glad obedient child.
In all his ways rejoice.
No one can fill my place—
It makes me glad to know,
There is a place for me.
A work for me to do.

—PHEBE A. HOLDER.

WILLIAM MCKINLEY.

McKinley was nominated for President in the first ballot, receiving 661½ out of a total of 1000. The other leading candidates were: Thomas B. Reed, 100 votes, M. S. Quay, 61½, and Levi P. Morton, 58. For Vice-President, Hon. Garrett A. Hobart, of New Jersey, was elected, receiving 533 1-2 votes, the next being Henry Clay Evans, who received 280½. Both nominations were unanimous. The great battle of the convention was, Gold vs. Silver, the conservative majority favoring the standard, while the silver men, representing a number of the Western States pronounced in support of a plank in the platform received only 10 votes in the entire gathering. Thirty of the silver delegates left the Convention. Senators Teller, Dubois, Pettibond and Cannon leading the movement. The platform, as adopted, declares in favor of a protective tariff, favors sound money, holds as the standard of value, and for free silver coinage except by international agreement with the leading nations of the world.

Garret McKinley, the candidate for President, is fifty-three years of age. He is from Niles, O., and was the son of a coal manufacturer. When the Civil War broke out, he was a student at Allen College, and he enlisted as a private in a company known as the Poland Company, which was incorporated into the 103rd Ohio Volunteers. He served under Gen. R. B. Hayes, and later under Sheridan, and took part in a number of engagements. His promotion was rapid, and he was finally brevetted as Major by President Lincoln for gallantry on the field for being mustered out in 1864. Major McKinley then resumed the practice of law in Canton, where he has ever since been active in political and social affairs. In 1869 he was elected County Prosecuting Attorney, and in 1876, he was sent to Congress at the age of thirty-three. He was continually for fourteen years. In 1890 he was elected Governor of Ohio, and re-elected two years later. During the latter part of his service in Congress, he was the Republican leader of the House, and was the foremost factor in the Tariff Act of 1890. He has been mentioned as a candidate for the nomination for President at the last three Republican Conventions, and on occasion developing considerable strength, although not sufficient to secure nomination. He is a man of strong physique, affable in manner, cogent in debate, with a faculty for organization and detail that has rarely been equalled. It companies. Through his business ability he has accumulated a considerable fortune.

Both the candidates are men of integrity and high principle, staunch supporters of the church and Christian work generally, and highly respected in their own communities.

The Free Silver men who left the Convention, have issued a protest to the country at large and have named Senator Henry M. Teller of Colorado as their choice for President.

Portraits of the Republican candidates appear on this page. For the photograph of Mr. Hobart we are indebted to the courtesy of the New York World.

China's Earliest Idols.

In the writings of the ancient Chinese philosopher, Mencius, a statement is given concerning the first images used in China. At first, they were made of grass and rushes, and afterwards of wood, to be buried with the dead, in order that they might be provided with servants in the other world. The art of statuary was not then known. But these cannot be called images to be worshipped. In the second century before Christ, an expeditionary force of 10,000 mounted men was sent past Lanchow to the mountain then known as Yenchishan, now Shantan, to attack the Hingnu Tartars. It was on the way to the Kiavukuan at the west end of the Great Wall. Here about B.C. 140 they defeated the Hingnu and captured an image used in sacrificing to heaven. It is called a "golden man," but it represented heaven. By the spread of Buddhism through Central Asia the Tartars had learned the use of images in worshipping God. It was gilt, as is the custom with images of Buddha, in all countries where that religion prevails. There can be little doubt that of the many ten thousands of

A Strange Temperance War.

PROBABLY one of the most remarkable temperance crusades ever recorded was that which took place in a village of Madagascar, called Loharano (The Well), lying half way between Antananarivo, the capital, and Ambositra. There is a resident missionary at Loharano. The people of Loharano some time since made an agreement among themselves that no rum or strong drink should be introduced into the market, and for some time none was introduced. At length, however, some rum-sellers, taking counsel together, resolved to force an opening for their trade. Accordingly, they combined to the number of seventy, concealed their short knives under their lambas, and one day took up a position in the market-place with their knives before them. Their idea was that the people would make an attempt to drive them out, and then, "the worse for the people." But their expectations were not realized. By some means the folk of Loharano got to know of the hidden weapons. They went to the missionary for advice, and then put their heads together and concocted a plan. All that day the preachers of the forbidden liquor stood in the glare of the sun in the market-place, waiting for thirsty customers to come and buy. But all day long the Loharano men sat there severely alone, and passed and passed before the eyes of the rum-sellers without aggravating stolidity. When evening came on, the disgusted rum-sellers loaded their donkeys again and went off to encamp for the night. But they were not to be daunted by mere lack of encouragement, and the next morning found them again, all seventy, duly posted on the market-place. Presently the towns-folk began to appear, and their numbers increased till the whole male population crowded around the rum-sellers, who bled with trepidation the gleam of the sun on naked knives and gun-barrels. Then a man stepped out from the crowd and made emphatic representations, advising the intruders to go away. The rum-sellers, seeing themselves outnumbered, had no alternative but to take up their demijohns and depart.

The First Christian Bells.

BELLS are of great antiquity, some made of bronze having been found even in the ruins of Nineveh. In an article on this subject in a contemporary, Miss Dixie Virginia Farley, gives this interesting information: About 46 A. D. bells were introduced into the Christian Church by Saint Paulinus, Bishop of Nola, in Campania. Their use in churches and monasteries soon spread throughout Christendom, and became intimately connected with the church service. Because they were associated in various ways with the ritual of the church, they acquired a sacredness of character. They were cast with religious ceremonies, given names, had sponsors, were sprinkled with water, anointed, and covered with the white chrism. In the Middle Ages it was the custom to put inscriptions on bells, like the following: "I call thee, I mourn the dead." "I praise thee, O God; call the people; assemble the clergy; bewail the dead; honor the saints." In the service of the church of the Middle Ages the duties of the bell were many. The "Ave Maria" was tolled twice each day, and at its sound every one withdrawing directed his prayer to the Virgin. The "vesper bell" was the call to evening prayer. There were also the "Compline" and "Sanctus" bells that called the faithful to their devotions. The "ringing-bell" was rung "to admonish the living and invite them to pray for the dead." First, the church bell was of a comparatively small size; and it was not until the fourteenth century that they reached a large size. The "Jacqueline" of Paris, cast in 1300, weighed seven and one-half tons; another, cast in 1472, weighed twelve tons. The most noted bells in the world are: one great bell at Pekin, the weight of which is fifty three and one-half tons; large bells at Olmutz, Rouen, and "E Ben," of Westminster, each of which weigh fourteen tons; Montreal, thirteen and one-half tons; York, ten and three-fourth tons; and last and largest of all, the great bell of Moscow, Russia; it is called the "Czar Pushkin," or "Emperor Bell." It was cast in 1653, has a great deal of silver and gold in its composition, and weighs no less than one hundred and ninety-eight tons, and is the largest bell in the world, both on account of its great size and weight.

Led Her Father to Jesus.

At a recent revival gathering in England the Rev. E. Payson Hammond related this touching incident: In a back seat in an inquiry meeting I saw a little girl, who had found the Saviour a few days before, with her arms around her father's neck. With the tears rolling down her cheeks, she was saying, "Dear father, won't you come to Jesus? Don't you remember when you were almost killed by that accident, you said you would be good afterwards? But you did not come to Jesus. You forgot all about him after a little while, and became as wicked as ever. How can you help loving him? He loves you, father." I said, "Will you not listen to your child? His only answer was, 'I am considering the subject.' At this his child wept louder than ever, and said, 'Oh, papa, don't reject such a precious Saviour.' But he would not yield, and as the meeting closed the child seemed heart-broken. A few nights after a lady came to me and said, 'My father is up in the men's inquiry-room, and my little sister is there with him. Will you go and speak to him?' She led me to her father, and there I found this same little daughter, no longer pleading with him to come to Jesus, but thanking God that he was coming. Her left arm was thrown around his neck, her right hand was uplifted, and she said, 'O God, I thank thee that my dear papa is coming to Jesus. Dear, precious Saviour, I know thou wilt receive him.' His handkerchief was wet with tears.

A few days after, just as I was starting with a company of young converts and Christians for Newville, a gentleman came to my room. It was the father of the little girl. "Oh," said I, "is it you?" and "did Jesus give you that smiling face? Has he answered your child's prayers?" "Yes, I believe he has. We now have prayer in our family, and I thank God for my praying child."

The Stream That is Never Crossed.

THERE'S many a sorrow and pain, I know,
As we tread the path of life;
There's many a grief and lasting woe,
And the way is toil and strife.
But the hardest load we have to bear,
Is the labor and strength that's lost
In building the bridge with toilsome care
O'er the stream that is never crossed.

We have fretting and worry from morn till night,
And anguish weighs on the heart;
The thorny way seems hard to right,
And life is a bitter part.

But there is a burden greater yet—
Much peace of soul it has cost—
It is building the bridge with toil and sweat,
O'er the bridge that is never crossed.

There's looking for crossings all the day,
And searching along the shore
For a bridge or ford along the way
We shall never travel o'er.
There's sighing for useless toys in vain
And dreaming of chances lost;
But 'tis hardest to bridge with might and main
The stream that is never crossed.

Then gather the roses along the way
And treasure their fragrance rare;
Rejoice in the bright and joyous day,
Refusing to borrow care;
For sorrow and pain will surely come
And your soul be tried and tossed;
But don't be bridging to reach your home
O'er the stream that is never crossed.

Have you Asthma or Hay-Fever?

Medical science at last reports a positive cure for Asthma and Hay-fever in the wonderful Kola Plant, a new botanical discovery found on the Congo River, West Africa. Its cures are really marvelous. Rev. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, W. Va., writes that it cured him of Asthma of fifty years' standing, and Hon. L. G. Clute, of Greeley, Iowa, testifies that for three years he had to sleep propped up in a chair in Hay-fever season, being unable to lie down night or day. The Kola Plant cured him at once. To make the matter sure, these and hundreds of other cures are sworn to before a notary public. So great is their faith in its wonderful curative powers, the Kola Importing Co., of 1164 Broadway, New York, to make it known is sending out large cases of the Kola compound free to sufferers from Asthma and Hay-fever. All they ask in return is that when cured yourself you will tell your neighbors about it. Send your name and address on a postal card, and they will send you a large case by mail free. It costs you nothing, and you should surely try it.

SCIATICA.

AUGUSTA, GA., July 16, 1894.
For two years I had not been free from sciatic pains and sometimes they were so severe that I would jump out of bed while asleep. I spent a large amount for special treatment, and was sixty-seven times cauterized with a white-hot iron. Hearing that a partner of Gen. Alger, of Detroit, had been cured by the Electropoise, I determined to try it. At that time I was almost helpless and could not walk to my office. One year's use of the Electropoise cured me, and I have been free from sciatica for three years now. I would not take $5,000 for my Electropoise if I could not get another. WM. C. HOW HAWAII GAVE UP ITS IDOLS.

Beautiful "Paradise of the Pacific," Now a Scene of Christian Activity—Gospel Work and Educational Progress—An Interesting Community.

REV. H. KIHARA.

ONE who has not been abroad in the lands where missionary work is done, can hardly realize the importance of the command to "Go unto all the world and preach the Gospel to every creature." One who has seen the manifestation of the missionaries' work is thoroughly impressed with the divinity of it. Christ spoke those words nearly two thousand years ago, and they still go sounding down the ages. In no country is the work of the missionary met with greater success than in the Hawaiian Islands. The good work has gone on, until the entire population is practically Christianized. The Hawaiian people had grown up in the worship of their idols before the missionaries came among them. They came to realize that their gods were false and their priests impostors, and in October, 1819, idolatry was abolished, and a large number of the wooden and stone images were gathered up and burned.

On March 31, 1820, the American brig, Thaddeus, brought the first missionaries to the islands. Their work soon began to show its effect on the people. Having no religion, and with souls hungering and thirsting after the blessed truth, they welcomed the teaching of the missionaries, and gladly learned of the true and living God. Soon after the work began there were conversions, and ere long little churches and school-houses began to appear. There was a general religious awakening among the natives, and hundreds, and in some cases thousands, were baptized in a single day. That these converted savages were sincere in their profession of faith cannot be denied. Some of the most pious Christians I have ever met were those old Hawaiians, converted to God long ago. Rev. Samuel Kapu, a native preacher of Wailuku, on the island of Maui, told me a touching story of his father: He was aged and feeble, and knew that his days on earth were few. He was ready to wing his flight to his eternal home; but the thought of his little boy weighed on his mind, and gave him great anguish. One night, little Samuel was awakened by tears falling on his breast. Those tears issued from the eyes of his aged father, who knew his hour had come. When he found his little boy awake, he told him he was going to die soon, and urged him to seek the kingdom of heaven. Then, commending his child to the care of the Almighty Father, the poor old man

The heart that loved him was forever still; the tongue that had spoken his name so often with affection was silent in death. Morning dawned, and he went to some distant relatives and told his story. The dead man was buried, and the lad went to live with those distant relatives. Early in life he was converted under the preaching of that able missionary, Rev. Titus Coan, and was educated for the ministry. He is now the native preacher of Wailuku, and is doing a noble work for God. The missionaries meet much opposition among ungodly men, who hate all that is good and pure. They often seek to influence the converted Hawaiians against their best friends, and lead them into vices. Kamehameha III., the just and good king of Hawaii, loved the missionaries, though ungodly men often tried to persuade him they were his enemies. Once an enemy of the missionaries, talking with him, remarked:

"You would be much better off if the missionaries had never come among you."

"No," the Christian monarch answered. "You have done three things since you entered my presence, that, but for the missionaries, would have cost you your life."

"What have I done?" asked the missionary-hater.

"You walked into my presence, instead of crawling; you crossed my shadow; you sat before me."

It was missionary influence that founded the Queens Hospital in Honolulu. In this elegant hospital, hundreds of sick and

The spiritual soil was well prepared for the seed which was to be sown. People cannot live without some sort of religion. of Maui, told me a touching story of his father:

The old Hawaiian had been converted under the preaching and teaching of the missionaries, and was serving God to the best of his ability. Kapu was very poor, and lived in an old grass house, with his little boy—all he had left of a once numer-died, and little Samuel was alone in the house with his dead parent. What must have been the feelings of that child thus suddenly bereft of his protector, as through the silent watches of the night, he sat in darkness by his dead father's side, in the gloom and silence of the old grass house!

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

WOMAN SACRIFICED.

A Sermon Preached by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., at Washington, D. C., on the Text: Esther 1: 11, 12, "To bring Vashti the queen before the king with the crown royal, to show the people and the princes her beauty; for she was fair to look on. But the queen Vashti refused to come at the king's commandment by his chamberlains; therefore was the king very wroth, and his anger burned in him."

WE stand amid the palaces of Shushan. The pinnacles are aflame with the morning light. The columns rise festooned and wreathed, the wealth of empires flashing from the grooves; the ceilings adorned with images of bird and beast, and scenes of prowess and conquest. The walls are hung with shields, and emblazoned until it seems that the whole round of splendors is exhausted. Each arch is a mighty leap of architectural achievement. Golden stars, shining down on glowing arabesque. Hangings of embroidered work in which mingle the blueness of the sky, the greenness of the grass, and the whiteness of the sea-foam. Tapestries hung on silver rings, wedding together the pillars of marble. Pavilions reaching out in every direction. These for repose, filled with luxuriant couches, into which weary limbs sink until all fatigue is submerged. These for carousal, where kings drink down a kingdom at one swallow. Amazing spectacle! Light of silver dripping down over stairs of ivory on shields of gold. Floors of stained marble, sunset red and night black, and inlaid with gleaming pearl. Why, it seems as if a heavenly vision of amethyst and jacinth and topaz and chrysoprasus had descended and alighted upon Shushan. It seems as if a billow of celestial glory had dashed clear over heaven's battlements upon this metropolis of Persia. In connection with this palace there is a garden, where the mighty men of foreign lands are seated at a banquet. Under the spread of oak and linden and acacia, the tables are arranged. The breath of honeysuckle and frankincense fills the air. Fountains leap up into the light, the spray struck through with rainbows falling in crystalline baptism upon flowering shrubs—then rolling down through channels of marble, and widening out here and there into pools swirling with the finny tribes of foreign aquariums, bordered with scarlet anemones, hypericums, and many-colored ranunculus. Meats of rarest bird and beast smoking up amid wreaths of aromatics. The vases filled with apricots and almonds. The baskets piled up with apricots and dates and figs and oranges and pomegranates. Melons tastefully twined with leaves of acacia. The bright waters of Eulæus filling the urns and sweating outside the rim in flashing beads amid the taceries. Wine from the royal vats of Ispahan and Shiraz, in bottles of tinged shell, and lily-shaped cups of silver, and flagons and tankards of solid gold. The music rises higher and the revelry breaks out into wilder transport, and the wine has flushed the cheek and touched the brain, and louder than all other voices are the hicough of the inebriates, the gabble of fools, and the song of the drunkards.

In another part of the palace, Queen Vashti is entertaining the princes of Persia at a banquet. Drunken Ahasuerus says to his servants: "You go out and fetch Vashti from that banquet with the women, and bring her to this banquet with the men, and let me display her beauty." The servants immediately start to obey the king's command; but there was a rule in Oriental society that no woman might appear in public without having her face veiled. Yet here was a mandate that no one dare dispute, demanding that Vashti come in unveiled before the multitude. However, there was in Vashti's soul a principle more regal than Ahasuerus, more brilliant than the gold of Shushan, of more wealth than the realm of Persia, which commanded her to disobey this order of the king; and so all the righteousness and holiness and modesty of her nature rise up into one sublime refusal. She says: "I will not go into the banquet unveiled." Of course Ahasuerus was infuriated; and Vashti, robbed of her position and her estate, is driven forth in poverty and ruin to suffer the scorn of a nation, and yet to receive the applause of after generations who shall rise up to admire this martyr to kingly insolence. Well, the last vestige of that feast is gone; the last garland has faded; the last arch has fallen; the last tankard has been destroyed; and Shushan is a ruin: but as long as the world stands there will be multitudes of men and women, familiar with the Bible, who will come into this picture gallery of God, and admire the divine portrait of Vashti the queen, Vashti the veiled, Vashti the sacrifice, Vashti the silent.

In the first place, I want you to look upon Vashti the queen. A blue ribbon, rayed with white, drawn around her forehead, indicated her queenly position. It was no small honor to be queen in such a realm as that. Hark to the rustle of her robes! See the blaze of her jewels! And yet, my friends, it is not necessary to have palace and regal robe in order to be queenly. When I see a woman with strong faith in God, putting her foot upon all meanness and selfishness and godless display, going right forward to serve Christ and the race by a grand and glorious service, I say: "That woman is a queen," and the ranks of heaven look over the battlements upon the coronation, and whether she come up from the shanty on the commons or the mansion of the fashionable square, I greet her with the shout: "All hail! Queen Vashti." What glory was there on the brow of Mary of Scotland, or Elizabeth of England, or Margaret of France, or Catherine of Russia, compared with the worth of some of our Christian mothers, many of them gone into glory?—or of that woman mentioned in the Scriptures, who put all her money into the Lord's treasury?—or of Jephthah's daughter, who made a demonstration of unselfish patriotism?—or of Abigail, who rescued the herds and flocks of her husband?—or of Ruth, who toiled under a tropical sun for poor, old, helpless Naomi?—or of Florence Nightingale, who went at midnight to stanch the battle-wounds of the Crimea?—or of Mrs. Adoniram Judson, who kindled the lights of salvation amid the darkness of Burmah?—or of Mrs. Hemans, who poured out her holy soul in words which will forever be associated with hunter's horn, and cap-tive's chain, and bridal hour, and lute's throb, and curfew's knell at the dying day?—and scores and hundreds of women, unknown on earth, who have given water to the thirsty and bread to the hungry and medicine to the sick and smiles to the discouraged—their footsteps heard along dark lane and in government hospital and in almshouse corridor and by prison gate? There may be no royal robe—there may be no palatial surroundings. She does not need them; for all charitable men will unite with the crackling lips of fever-struck hospital and plague-blotched lazaretto in greeting her as she passes: "Hail! Hail! Queen Vashti."

Again: I want you to consider Vashti the veiled. Had she appeared before Ahasuerus and his court on that day, with her face uncovered, she would have shocked all the delicacies of Oriental society, and the very men who in their intoxication demanded that she come, in their sober moments would have despised her. As some flowers seem to thrive best in the dark lane and in the shadow, and where the sun does not seem to reach them, so God appoints to most womanly natures a retiring and unobtrusive spirit. God once in a while does call an Isabella to a throne, or a Miriam to strike the timbrel at the front of a host, or a Marie Antoinette to quell a French mob, or a Deborah to stand at the front of an armed battalion, crying out, "Up! Up! This is the day in which the Lord will deliver Sisera into thine hand." And when women are called to such outdoor work and to such heroic positions, God prepares them for it; and they have iron in their souls and lightning in their eye, and whirlwinds in their breath, and the borrowed strength of the Lord Omnipotent in their right arm. They walk through furnaces as though they were hedges of wild-flowers, and cross seas as though they were shimmering sapphire; and all the harpies of hell down to their dungeon at the stamp of her womanly indignation. But these are the exceptions. Generally, Dorcas would rather make a garment for the poor boy; Rebecca would rather fill the trough for the camels; Hannah would rather make a coat for Samuel; the Hebrew maid would rather give a prescription for Naaman's leprosy; the woman of Sarepta would rather gather a few sticks to cook a meal for famished Elijah; Phebe would rather carry a letter for the inspired apostle; mother Lois would rather educate Timothy in the Scriptures. When I see a woman going about her daily duty—with cheerful dignity presiding at the table, with kind and gentle, but firm discipline presiding in the nursery, going out into the world without any blast of trumpets, following in the footsteps of him who went about doing good—I say: "This is Vashti with a veil on." But when I see a woman of unblushing boldness, loud-voiced with a tongue of infinite clatter-clatter, with arrogant look, passing through the streets with the step of a walking-beam, gayly arrayed in a very hurricane of millinery, I cry out: "Vashti has lost her veil!" When I see a woman of comely features, and of adroitness of intellect, and endowed with all that the schools can do for one, and of high social position, yet moving in society, with superciliousness and hauteur, as though she would have people know their place, and an undefined combination of giggle and strut and rhodomontade, endowed with allopathic quantities of talk, but only homeopathic infinitesimals of sense, the terror of dry-goods clerks and railroad conductors, discoverers of significant meanings in plain conversation, prodigies of badinage and innuendo—I say: "Look! look! Vashti has lost her veil."

Again: I want you to consider Vashti the sacrifice. Who is this I see coming out of that palace gate of Shushan? It seems to me that I have seen her before. She comes homeless, houseless, friendless, trudging along with a broken heart. Who is she? It is Vashti the sacrifice. O, what a change it was from regal position to a wayfarer's crust. A little while ago, proved and sought for; now, none so ready as to acknowledge her acquaintances, Vashti the sacrifice! Ah! you and I have seen it many a time. Here is a home palaced with beauty. All that refinement and books and wealth can do for a home has been done; but Ahasuerus, her husband and the father, is taking holy paths of sin. He is gradually going down. After awhile he will flounder and struggle like a wild beast in the hunter's net—further away from God, further away from the right. Soon the bright apparel of the children will turn to rags; soon the household song will become the sob of a broken heart. The old story comes again. Brutal Centaurs breaking up a marriage feast of Lapithæ. The house of outrage and cruelty and abomination while trudging forth from the palace gate are Vashti and her children. There are homes that are in danger of such a breaking-up. O, Ahasuerus! that you should stand in a home, by a dissipated life, destroying the peace and comfort of the home. God forbid that your child should ever have to wring their hands and have people point their finger at them as they pass down the street, and say: "There goes a drunkard's child." God forbid that the little feet should ever have to trudge the path of poverty and wretchedness! God forbid that any evil spawn of the wine-cup or the brandy-glass should come forth and uproot that garden and with a lasting, blistering, all-consuming curse, shut forever the palace gate against Vashti and the children!

During the war I went to Hagerstown to look at the army, and I stood in the night on a hill-top and looked down upon them. I saw the camp-fires all through the valleys and all over the hills. It was a weird spectacle, those camp-fires, and I stood and watched them; and the soldiers who were gathered around them were, doubt, talking of their homes and of the long march they had taken and of the battles they were to fight; but after awhile I saw these camp-fires begin to lower: they continued to lower, until they were all gone out, and the army slept. It was imposing when I saw the camp-fires; was imposing in the darkness when I thought of that great host asleep. We God looks down from heaven, and he sees the firesides of Christendom and the loved ones gathered around these firesides. These are the camp-fires where we warm ourselves at the close of the day, and take over the battles of life we have fought at the battles that are yet to come. God grant that when at last these fires begin to go out and continue to lower until finally they are extinguished, and the ashes of consumed hopes strew the hearth of the old homestead, it may be because we have Gone to sleep that last long sleep.

From which none ever wake to weep.

Now, we are an army on the march of life. Then, we will be an army bivouacked in the tent of the grave.

Once more: I want you to look at Vashti the silent. You do not hear an outcry from this woman as she goes forth from the palace gate. From the very dignity of her nature, you know there will be no vociferation. Sometimes in life it is necessary to make a retort; sometimes in life it is necessary to resist; but there are crises when the most triumphant thing to do is to keep silence. The philosopher confident in his newly-discovered principle, waiting for the coming of more intelligent generations, willing that men should laugh at the lightning-rod and cotton-gin and steamboat—waiting for long years through the scoffing of philosophical schools, in grand and magnificent silence Galileo, condemned by mathematicians and scientists, caricatured everywhere, yet waiting and watching with his telescope to see the coming up of stellar reinforcements, when the stars in their courses would fight for the Copernican system; then sitting down in complete blindness and deafness to wait for the coming on of the generations who would build his monument and bow at his grave. The Reformer, execrated by his contemporaries, fanned in a pillory, the slow fires of public attempt burning under him, ground out the cylinders of the printing-press, patiently waiting for the day when purified soul and heroism of character will receive sanction of earth and the plaudits of heaven. Affliction, enduring without complaint the sharpness of the pang and the violence of the storm, and the heft of the chain and of the darkness of night. When, until a Divine hand shall be put forth to soothe the pang and hush the storm and release the captive. A wife, persecuted, and a perpetual exile for every earthly comfort — waiting, waiting, until the Lord shall gather all his children in a heavenly home, and no Vashti will ever be thrust out from the palace gate. Jesus, in silence and answering not a word, drinking the gall, bearing the cross, in prospect of the rapturous consummation when

Angels thronged his chariot wheel,
And bore him to his throne;
Then swept their golden harps and sung
The glorious work is done.

Woman! does not this story of Vashti the Queen, Vashti the veiled, Vashti the voiceless, Vashti the silent, move your heart? My sermon converges into the one thrilling hope that none of you may be shut out of the palace gate of heaven. You endure the hardships and the privations and the cruelties and the misfortunes of this life, if you can only gain admission to the

Through the blood of the everlasting covenant, you go through these gates never go at all. God forbid that you should at last be banished from the society of angels, and banished from the companionship of your glorified kindred, and washed forever. Through the rich grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, may you be enabled to imitate the example of Rachel, Hannah and Abigail and Deborah and Mary and Esther and Vashti. Amen.

A Modern Simeon.

With the very aged Christian the desire to depart and be with Christ which is "better," is frequently present. There is serene and peaceful outlook and a perfect trust in the Divine assurance that all will be well.

The well-known and learned Professor Luck once travelled through Italy, and his journey formed the acquaintance of an aged coachman. When he was about to leave, the Professor asked the old man what the greatest desire for the remainder of his life upon this earth was. Without hesitation the old man answered: "Vivere in pace con Dio!" "To depart in peace with God." That desire, which was uttered by the aged Simeon (Luke 23:32), was also the greatest and last desire of this old Italian coachman. Though he says that none of the beautiful, grand, or sublime things which he was privileged to see in Italy made such a powerful and blessed impression on him as this life incident.

Mennonites in America.

At the present time, the Mennonites in Manitoba number 2960 families, a total of 2000 souls. They have 235,160 acres under cultivation. Last year they harvested 3,500,000 bushels of grain, exclusive of flax. Of flax they raised 950,000 bushels. They own 11,000 horses, 8,300 cows and 10,000 young cattle. The colony borrowed $195,000 from the Dominion Government at five per cent. and from their brethren of Waterloo, Ontario, $20,000 without interest. In 1891 they had paid the whole amount of these loans with interest, and are now quite free from debt, and prosperous in every respect. The creed of these peculiar people forbids them to carry arms. They were originally expelled from Germany by Frederick William, and settled in Russia, where the Czar Nicholas granted them exemption from military service for 100 years. Finding there was little probability of a further exemption, they emigrated to Canada, where the government granted them a fertile tract of ground and freedom from military service forever.

How Hawaii Gave Up its Idols

picturesque sight. It is usually crowded with ships, from nearly every part of the world; but in some of the shallow portion, one can sometimes see natives in their long canoes, with quaint out-riggers to keep them from capsizing.

The valley is on the Island of Maui, and is a famous resort for picnic, excursions, and native *luau*s. The scenery can hardly be excelled in beauty anywhere in the world. Not only do the missionaries bring joy to the soul of the heathen, but they help to make the wilderness blossom as the rose. The natives still love the deep, sylvan shades of their tropical forests and, after school hours, the children wander among them to gather tropical fruits and to enjoy the cool shadows, or they seek the rolling surf on the sea-shore, in which they swim and sport like young dolphins.

It is not the Hawaiians alone who have felt the beneficent influence of the missionary work. There are many Chinese and Japanese who, through them, have come to know the true God. When converted, the Japanese make earnest and devoted Christians. Reverend H. Kihara, the pastor of the Japanese M. E. Church in Honolulu, is one among the most earnest working Japanese Christians. He has a large membership, but his people are poor. Day and night he labors to bring souls to Christ. Not only does he preach in the poor hall which answers for a church, but he is constantly talking and preaching in the Japanese quarters of the city, telling the old sweet story of the Cross.

"It is very hard to convert my people," he said to the writer. "Bad white men sometimes undo all that the missionaries have done. It makes me sad when I think of it."

It makes any one sad. The white sailor, usually a reckless, dissipated fellow, teaches the natives and Japanese vices and immorality, and thus comes in constant conflict with the missionaries. It is of such influences that Kihara and others complain. The converted Japanese are live, wide-awake Christians, not those who dream life away. They are actively working, doing something for Jesus. Even the children, when converted to Christianity, become little workers in their Master's vineyard.

In the Hawaiian Islands, the labors of the missionaries have been amply rewarded. Islands where once were only heinous and hideous idols, are now dotted with school-houses and churches. In traveling through the islands, one is hardly ever out of sight of one of those neat little temples of worship, whose spires, pointing heavenward, seem silently directing the sinner's thoughts to the throne of grace and eternal glory.

The Late Shah's Library.

Nasr-ed-din, the late Shah of Persia, had a room in the palace of Teheran hung with priceless tapestries, and next to it was the library, filled with manuscripts, many of them worth a colossal fortune. Of all the great Persian authors, Mir seems to be the most famous, and his writing is valued at two tumaris a line. At this rate the manuscripts by him in the Shah's possession must be worth several millions of dollars! The armory of the palace is small and inferior to many European collections. The crown jewels are worth many millions. Among them is the sister-diamond to the Kohinoor (Mountain of Light.) It is a huge diamond an inch and a half long and an inch broad, but not very bright, and could be pardonably mistaken for glass. It dates from 3000 B. C.

A Prayer.

(Written for "The Christian Herald.")

SAVIOUR, keep me thro' to-day;
Just for this I humbly pray,
And for this I bow my knee.
Closer draw me, Lord, to thee,
Let me learn to do thy will.
Keep my sinful longings still.
Lead me in thy own dear way,
Only, Saviour, for to-day.
So shall all my wand'rings cease,
Walking in thy paths of peace,
So shall I more humble grow,
When thy humble ways I know.
Thou wilt watch to-morrow's need,
All my suff'rings thou wilt heed.
So but this I meekly pray,
Keep me, Saviour, for to-day.

Slaves of the Soudan.

Some of the Evils the Philafrican Liberator's League will have to Face in its Work.

IN THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of June 3, it was explained how prevalent the slave-trade still is in the Western Soudan, even in the immediate vicinity of the French posts. Slatin Pasha, who has recently escaped from the clutches of the Mahdi's successor, Khalifa Abdullahi, gives a vivid description of the infamous traffic in the Eastern Soudan. If the Khalifa prohibits the exportation of slaves from his kingdom, he encourages the importation of slaves from the adjacent countries, and no business is more flourishing, under his rule, than the trade in human beings. The Khalifa claims the monopoly of this lucrative commerce, and all the slave caravans hailing from Abyssinia, from Fashoda, from Darfur and other points, converge to the Khalifa's capital, Omdurman. The same cruelty which was evinced at the places of capture, when the able-bodied fathers and brothers were ruthlessly slain, is again manifested on the transport of the captured women and children to the Khalifa's royal slave-mart. Of the thousands of Christian Abyssinians captured by Abu

SOLDIERS OF THE EASTERN SOUDAN.

Anga, mostly women and children, the majority died on the path from ill-treatment and starvation. Many of the survivors were in such a wretched condition that nobody would buy them. After the defeat of the Shilluks, Zeki Tummam crammed so many thousands of captives into the transport boats that thousands were choked or crushed to death. Of those who survived, the young men were incorporated into the army, the women and girls sold at auction, and the sale lasted several days. Hundreds of the unfortunate women were so reduced by starvation that nobody would buy them. They dragged themselves to the brink of the river, where they perished. Their corpses were thrown into the Nile so as to prevent an epidemic.

It is impossible to conceive the sufferings experienced by the slaves from Darfur, on the way through the desert. Their conductors were instructed, as a proof of their faithfulness, to cut off the ears of those who died on the way, and they often cut off the ears of those who could not proceed, without awaiting their death. At El-Facher, there was a woman who had survived this mutilation. Later, the importation of slaves from the Darfur has almost ceased because that region has been depopulated. To make up this deficiency, the Khalifa allows now his emirs to purchase slaves from the wandering Gellabas.

The Sook er Rekirk (slave-mart), of Omdurman is situated near the Beit el Ma' (treasury). It is a plain building, made of sun-dried bricks. There the professional slave-dealers meet day after day, and exhibit their human merchandise to the gaze of the purchasers. The slaves stand all around against the walls of the house. They are all females, because the male slaves can be sold only to the Khalifa, who takes them at a nominal price. All those who are not fit to be soldiers are sent to the plantations.

The women and girls in the market are scrutinized by the customers as so many heads of cattle. Their mouths are opened, to see whether their teeth are in good condition. One limb after the other is carefully examined, especially the arms. They are ordered to walk forth and back. They must answer questions in Arabic, so as to show their proficiency in that tongue. They are subjected to a volley of personal questions concerning their moral weaknesses. The purchaser naturally tries to detect all the imperfections of the subject before him so as to reduce the price. When, at last the bargain is concluded, it must be ratified by a written document signed by two witnesses, one of whom must be a cadi (judge), certifying that the slave really belonged to the man who sold her. This law is intended to prevent the sale of kidnapped slaves. The average prices paid for slaves at the time of Slatin Pasha's captivity were: For an elderly working woman, $50 to $80; for a middle-aged woman, $80 to $120; for girls between eight and eleven, $110 to $160; for suryas (concubines), $180 to $400. The prices vary much according to the race, the beauty, the knowledge, or the character of the slave.

If the newly undertaken campaign of the Anglo-Egyptians against the Dervishes is crowned with success, thousands of slaves will no doubt be liberated. But, as in Gordon's time, they may be freed from the dervish yoke only to pass into the harems and plantations of the Egyptian victors who are inveterate slave-dealers. Native slavery will no more disappear from the Eastern Soudan, if it should come under British rule, than it has vanished from Zanzibar, the Niger Basin, and other British Protectorates. Government action has again and again been proved to be inadequate. It is necessary and desirable, but it must be supplemented by the patient, devoted, and disinterested efforts of Liberators' Leagues, which by their work of social reconstruction on Christian foundations, prevent the relapse of the ex-slaves, teach the honor of labor, and the sinfulness of slave-holding, while they render slavery unnecessary by the introduction of new ideas, new modes of life, and a Christian order of society.

Were the Philafrican Liberator's League sufficiently equipped, it might follow in the wake of British advance into the Eastern Soudan, and establish there some of its refuges and settlements of liberated slaves, to be object-lessons to all the surrounding heathen or Mohammedan communities. Devoted men and women are willing to go and work for the emancipation and education of the slaves. Who would not rejoice to give his mite to send them forth on their blessed mission?

The Philafrican Liberator's League, 511 United Charities Building, New York, will send to any address pamphlets explaining the programme and the constitution of the League.

The Ark Removed.

Sunday School Lesson for July 19. II. Sam. 6: 1-12. Golden Text, Psalm 84: 12. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE ark of God was the pledge of his presence with his people. Made of wood, and overlaid with gold within and without (Ex. 25: 10, 11), it was a type of the union of the human and divine; God the Word made flesh and dwelling among us; Christ in us, the Hope of glory, making us partakers of his divine nature. The mercy seat, which formed the lid of the ark was all of pure gold; and "of one piece with the mercy seat," inseparable from it, were the two cherubims, those mysterious beings, first seen standing at the gate of Eden after the fall, as well as "the flame of a sword" which turned every way, "to keep the way of the tree of life" (Gen. 3: 24; R.V.), were always connected with the presence of God. We find, again and again, that he is represented as, "Thou that sittest upon (or dwellest between) the cherubims" (Ps. 80: 1, 2; Sam. 6: 2; II. Kings 19: 15, etc.) Departing from the earth when the glory of God left the temple (Ezek. 10: 2-4; 18, 19; 11: 22, 23), they reappear in the midst of the throne of heaven (Rev. 4: 6). Wherever the presence of God is especially to be found with his people, there they are to be found.

The mercy seat, with the cherubims was to be "above, upon the ark," and the testimony, the law was to be placed within. "Thy law is within my heart" (Ps. 40: 8). And God said to Moses, "And there I will meet with thee, and I will commune with thee from above."

The Mercy Seat,

from between the two cherubims, which are upon the ark of testimony, of all things which I will give thee in commandment unto the children of Israel" (Ex. 25: 22, R.V.). "And when Moses went into the tent of meeting to speak with him, then he heard the Voice speaking unto him from above the mercy seat; that was upon the ark of the testimony, from between the two cherubims; and he spake unto him" (Num. 7: 89). These solemn descriptions of the ark and its purpose in the worship of Israel, enable us to understand at least in some degree, the profanity and sin of the children of Israel, when, in the days of Eli, they were smitten before the Philistines, and, in order to ensure victory, they sent for the ark of God saying, "Let us fetch the ark of the covenant of the Lord out of Shiloh unto us, that it may come among us, and save us out of the hand of our enemies" (I. Sam. 4: 1-3). God had ordained that the ark of his covenant should be veiled: no man might draw near, except the high priest, and he only once a year with blood offered for himself and for the sins of the people (Lev. 16). And now the profane and irreverent hands of Hophni and Phineas were laid upon the ark, and an unhumiliated people did not scruple to make an impious attempt to force God, he who sitteth upon the cherubims to serve their purpose. In vain they shouted with a great shout when the ark came into the camp (I. Sam. 4: 5). The ark of God remained behind, and the ark fell into the hands of the enemy.

A Religion which Ignores Sin and the need for atonement, is always popular, but it betrays the honor of God into the hands of the ungodly, and proves that the ungodly are found more righteous than professing believers. The ark in which the people trusted was taken by the Philistines, and thirty thousand infantry of Israel fell before the Philistines. How many are there in our own time who have fallen a prey to a specious form of religion which claims to have fellowship with God without any cleansing by the blood of Christ, and which carries the most sacred things into the world and lays profane hands upon that which God had hidden! And thus the world and the flesh can boast as the Philistines did of old, that the ark is among them; fear and reverence for that which is holy is dying out of our generation, and the world is fast ripening for the antichrist.

In God's wondrous grace, he raised up, just for this time, a witness in the person of Samuel, who, not of the sons of Aaron, was yet permitted to exercise priestly functions, not of the tribe of Judah, and yet practically governing Israel as God's instrument and mediator, for God "did let none of his words fall to the ground" (I. Sam. 3: 19-21). And the presence of the Lord, which was not with the ark, was found in this one man, a striking type in many ways of him who should afterward be known as the Word of God. Samuel might offer sacrifice for all Israel, and his testimony must remain until God's king, David was anointed. Meanwhile, the ark of God had been no easy possession to the Philistines; their idol, Dagon, had fallen to pieces before it; they themselves were smitten with plagues, and their very priests recognized that the hand of the God of Israel was upon them. And finally they resolved to send away the ark of God not without guilt offerings, for they were more righteous than God's people, into the land of Israel, on a new cart, drawn by milch kine whose calves were kept at home, and which should be left free to follow their own course. They took the straight road to Beth-shemesh. But a people who had profanely carried the ark of God into the battlefield, and had not repented of their sin, were quite ready to yield to and look into the ark, bringing down judgment upon themselves. Thus, twenty years the ark of God was kept in the house of Abinadab, but not brought to the tabernacle at Shiloh, not united with the altar. The sacrifices might be slain but the day of atonement when the offering for the sins of all Israel was made, could not be held, as the holy of holies was absent. All the days of King Saul, the altar and the ark were separated; and one of the first acts of David, after he was anointed king over all Israel, was to bring up the ark of God from Baale of Judah, i.e., Kirjath-jearim. But in this, David did not follow his ordinary habit, inquiring of the Lord. How many there are who when they are quite sure they are to do a right thing, fail to wait upon the Lord for the right time or the right way to do it! David imitated the Philistines, and put the ark upon a new cart. But the holy presence of the Lord is not to be manifested by things but by persons; idols may be carried upon carts; the ark of God demands surrendered men. The oxen stumbled, Uzzah put forth his hand to steady the ark, and he died there for this act of irreverence. And David showed a wrong spirit, he lost his temper, manifested impatience with his God; his plans were upset, his immense concourse of people could see that he had made a mistake and was mortified. So he carried the ark into the house of Obed-edom. But when he learned how God blessed the man in whose house the ark was, David repented, and took up the thread of God's will, where he had dropped it; a lesson to many of God's children. Only, instead of leading thirty thousand chosen men of Israel to bring up the ark, just the number of men who were slain when the ark was taken, he took "all the house of Israel" with him (ver. 15), and he had learned his lesson and said, "None ought to carry the ark of God but the Levites; for them hath the Lord chosen to carry the ark of God and to minister unto him for ever." And the king made a full confession, and took all the blame upon himself. In calling upon the heads of the house of Aaron and of the Levites he said to them in his call that they should bring up the ark, "Because ye did it not at the first, the Lord made a breach upon us, for that we sought him not according to the ordinance. So the priests and the Levites sanctified themselves to bring up the ark of the Lord, the God of Israel" (I. Chron. 15: 12.)

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

DAVID appears to have reigned over all Israel about seven years before he made his capital the religious, as well as the political centre of the nation. Probably the work of rebuilding and reorganizing the city occupied all that time, but at last, the place was ready for the reception of the symbol of the divine presence, the ark which was made nearly five hundred years before. It was a box of acacia wood about four feet long and two and a quarter both in height and width, inlaid and overlaid with gold. The lid was of solid gold, and upon it were images of two angels face to face with outstretched wings. Within were the tables of the law, Aaron's rod, and a golden vessel of manna. It was to stand in the innermost part of the Tabernacle, but it had not been there since Eli's sons (as related in I. Samuel 4: 4), removed it some seventy years before to carry it into the battle with the Philistines. The story of what happened to the Philistines who held it as a trophy is told in the two following chapters (I. Samuel 5 and 6). Saul had not troubled himself about it, but David wished to have it near him. The day of the removal was to be a national holiday and, as we learn from the fuller account in I. Chronicles 13, the Levites were summoned from their villages, and the flower of the army to the number of thirty thousand men, were gathered to make the occasion one of pomp and national pageantry. The whole company gathered at Kirjath-jearim (or Baale as it was formerly called), a town about eleven miles south-west of Jerusalem, in the Bethlehem country. David wrote special Psalms for the occasion, one of which is numbered twenty-four in our collection. Probably Psalms 68 and 15 were also written for the same celebration. The pageant was brought to an abrupt close, before it had accomplished its purpose, by the strange fatality described in the lesson. It is difficult to account for Uzzah's death. It seems a severe punishment for an act, which in the circumstances, as they are described, appeared natural, if not involuntary. Possibly a lesson of reverence may have been needed by king and people. They had disregarded the ordinance (Num. 4: 15), which minutely prescribed the method for the removal of the ark, and had adopted the Philistine method of a new ox-cart, and there may have been other circumstances, not recorded, which indicated a lack of proper respect for the symbolic shrine. David seems to have been terrified and would not proceed with the ceremony. The ark was taken to the nearest Levite and left in his house. Three months later, when David learned that blessing and not judgment was associated with the ark, he gathered the people together again, and had the ark carried, in the way appointed, into Jerusalem. He had learned the lesson which still needs to be impressed on the Lord's people, that the Lord's work must be done in the Lord's way. A church, or a mission, or any religious enterprise must be conducted on pure, unworldly principles. It is difficult to apply business methods to it. The Philistine ox-cart they may as well more effective, but may involve disaster. God is able to take care of his cause; he will trust him. It may seem to be in danger at times, but it is saved not by human might or human skill, but by the power of God. When a man is glorified and is forgotten the man may be remembered simply to show the Church and the world that God is not dependent for his work on human help.

Put forth his hand to the ark and took it. There was a stringent prohibition against this, (Numbers 4: 15), but Uzzah, thought at all, probably thought the emergency justified him in disregarding it is never safe to do that especially in religious matters. Those who serve the must be careful to obey him and they never succeed by disobeying. A New York journalist relates a case in point. A church on the other side the Atlantic, by a series of troubles drifted into difficulties. The minister resigned and the treasury was empty. It looked as if the church would collapse. There were some successful business men in the membership, who believed in business methods. Instead of calling the church together for prayer in the emergency, they resorted to a trick. A minister was invited who had a strong following in a rival church in the same town. It was hoped that he would draw away from the church the members who admired him so build up the other. The trick was honorable, but the leaders thought would pay and they adopted other methods which seemed promising, beautifying the building, organizing a new choir, holding bazaars—all with the object of attracting new holders and making the church financial success. There was no thought of saving souls or doing the Lord's work. The issue was a most disastrous failure. After a large expenditure of money to purpose, the church building was sold and the people scattered.

They set the ark of God upon a new cart. God had commanded that when it was moved it should be carried by men consecrated to that special duty. But the ark was heavy, there were eleven miles to over hills and through valleys, how much wiser to let oxen do the work. And the cart was new, it had never been used for any ignoble purpose. But this was the obedience God requires; it was the application of human wisdom. Louis XI of France was told that Lord Stair was the most courtly man in Europe. His devotion to royalty was an example to courtiers. "I will test him," said the king. One day he invited the nobleman to accompany him for an airing in the park. At the carriage door the king bade Lord Stair enter the carriage first. An ordinary man would have protested against this breach of good manners and have insisted on following, not preceding his majesty. But Lord Stair obeyed unhesitatingly. The king's command was sufficient. "The world has spoken truly," said Louis. "There is no tribute equal to prompt obedience."

David was afraid of the Lord. He had gained a new view of the Divine character. We hear so much in this day of God as a God of love, that there is danger of overlooking the converse truth that he is a God of justice, who will by no means pass lightly over sin. The two nature are not inconsistent. A gentle, loving wise mother will fight like a tigress in defense of her babe. The more affectionate a wise and honorable father is, the more likely is he to punish his son for wrong doing. The story is told of a famous judge, remarkable for his kindness no less than his learning, that a friend who visited him one evening found him in tears. Surprised at his agitation, he asked what trouble had befallen him. "Trouble enough," answered the judge. "To-morrow morning I have to sentence the son of an old friend. His father has just been here pleading with me for him. I would do anything in reason for that good man, who was my friend at school as a boy, but I cannot do what he asks me. I must send the young man to prison for a long term, and it will break his father's heart. It is the hardest thing I ever had to do, but there is no escape for me. I must do my duty, but it is hard, it is so hard." "I shall never forget," says his friend, "how that conscientious man suffered, knowing that he must not yield."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

A Quaint Albanian Rite.

ON the shore of the Bosphorus, and forming a part of its beautiful panorama, is the Albanian village of Arnaut Keoi, which is the scene of a peculiar annual religious rite. On a certain day the Greek passengers to the margin of the sea and casts the waters a silver cross. This done, the pious Greeks leap into the sea and for the cross, whoever succeeds in reaching it from the depths being rewarded with an offering of silver from the spectators who never fail to gather in large numbers when the ceremonial of "Diving for the Cross" is about to take place. Precisely what meaning the ceremony has, does not appear, but it is probably associated in some way with the rite known as "blessing of the waters." That it is a remnant of some doctrine of the Greek Church, we may well believe. The reward given to the man who finds the cross and restores it, is probably not large, as the people who contribute are poor, but the honor doubtless counts for something. The Cross, with all its importance, were really lost to the world, and men could no longer look to it for salvation. The loss would be so great that all the wealth of the world would not be enough to reward the man who could restore it. Only those know how precious it is who can say of the Apostle:

God will that I should glory in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, in which the world is crucified unto me and I unto the world. (Gal. 6:14.)

Mark a Wreck.

The Cunard Steamer Laria met with a singular accident on June 27 in leaving New York for Liverpool. The big Cunarder of 680 cabin passengers aboard was taken down May at nine o'clock. A foul pilot was in charge of the passengers were lying about the deck in the highest spirits. Suddenly there was an exciting interruption to the voyage. In Gedney's channel, about two miles off Sandy Hook, the vessel struck an obstacle, ground along in a crushing sound for a few minutes stopped. Her head was low and her keel so high above the water that her hull was exposed. She had struck on the hull of a coal barge which had been wrecked in the channel on May 22. The Laria had gone three-fourths of her length over the wreck before she stopped. There was some excitement among the passengers for a time, but they were assured there was no danger and they calmed down. All day the steamer lay helpless waiting for the evening tide to raise her above the submerged vessel. Four powerful tugs were sent to her and hawsers were attached to the great ship. At high water they began to pull, and after half-an-hour's hard work the Cunarder was dragged off. A thorough examination of the interior by the officers and of the exterior by divers, showed that no serious injury had been received, and the vessel accordingly proceeded on her voyage. The curious fact about the accident is that the pilot was well aware of the obstruction in the channel, and had noticed the buoys which marked its exact position. Whether he forgot it for the moment, or whether there was any defect in the steering-gear which prevented his guiding the steamer safely past, will doubtless be made the subject of inquiry. We know that similar explanations are given of spiritual disasters. It often happens that vigilance is lax just at the time it is most needed and even when the believer is aware of his danger, he sometimes feels himself powerless to resist temptation. The Apostle

Peter, who had sad experience of such occasions, utters the warning:

Be sober, be vigilant; because your adversary, as a roaring lion, walketh about seeking whom he may devour. (1 Peter 5:8.)

Saved by his Daughter.

News of a narrow escape from drowning comes from Monmouth Beach, N. J. A famous New York physician has a summer cottage there, where he has been staying with his family for several weeks past. One hot morning recently he went out for a swim. He was in deep water some distance from shore and had turned to swim to land, when he became exhausted and sank. His daughter happened to be on the beach at the time and saw her father's danger. There was no boat at hand to go to his assistance and no one was able to do anything for him. But his daughter would not see him drown without making an effort to save him. She grasped a life-preserver, to which a rope was attached, and, shop to sharpen one of the drills for a workman. He was busy at the job when a spark flew from the drill across the shop into a half-open can of powder. An explosion followed instantly, and the force of it fired the other cans, which were piled against the wall, thirty-three in all. The roof and walls of the shop were blown to pieces. When the workmen at the quarry, alarmed by the shock, went to the shop, they found the place in ruins and the blacksmith, fearfully torn and mangled, lying among them. A doctor was sent for, but before he arrived the man was dead. One spark had been sufficient to cause the disaster. There was no need of a fire to do that. It is so with the character. People often talk lightly of little sins, but the little sin, like the spark, is destructive in its nature, and is sufficient to ruin the soul.

Behold how great a matter a little fire kindleth. (James 3:6.)

A Mad Dog Scare.

There was almost a panic on Broadway, New York, a few days ago, owing to the behavior of a small long-haired dog. It came out of Thirty-eighth Street, and tore wildly up the crowded thoroughfare. It was frothing at the mouth, and to all appearances was mad. Snapping viciously at every one in its way, but, happily, biting no one, it ran four blocks without being molested. People jumped aside to let singular discovery he had made. Among the customers of the house was the firm of T. & H. Smith, who were the leading dealers in agricultural implements in one of the larger Illinois towns. The transactions between the two business houses continued for several years and were mutually satisfactory. Recently, on one of his business trips the Chicago merchant visited the town and called on the firm. He saw the junior partner and made him an offer of an extensive line of goods on advantageous terms. The country merchant hesitated. There was no question as to the price or quality of the goods, but he was in doubt as to whether the firm could handle so large a quantity. He said he must consult his brother who was the senior partner. He would do so that night. The Chicago man arranged to call in the morning for the decision and went to a hotel for the night. Casually mentioning to a chance acquaintance the cause of his being detained, he was amazed to hear that the senior partner of the firm for whose decision he was waiting, had been dead for twenty years. He remembered, when the fact was stated, that he had never seen him, but had always done his business with the junior partner. Yet the man had certainly told him that he must consult his brother. His informant was not surprised. He said that the surviving brother had always insisted that his brother conducted the business. If any question of doubt or difficulty arose he would postpone it till night when he could confer with the spirit of his departed partner. A practical proof of his sincerity was that the profits of the business were divided in the same proportions as when the elder brother was alive, his share being paid to his heirs. No one knew how the surviving brother professed to hold conference with his brother, but as he is a shrewd man himself, the ghostly decisions have not been detrimental to the business. That they were a delusion there can be no doubt in the mind of any one but a spiritualist. The only real supernatural help that can come to a man is that which comes from the fulfillment of the promise:

In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths. (Prov. 3:6.)

An Imperial Gift.

A bright boy of ten years old in Philadelphia has had a gift from the Russian Emperor. The Public Ledger of that city says that the parents of the lad had been talking in his hearing of the imposing ceremonies of the coronation. The boy went to his room and was found there some hours later, busy over the composition of a letter. He finished it to his satisfaction at last, and showed it to his parents. To their amusement and surprise, they found that the lad's letter was addressed to the Czar of all the Russias. It referred to the fact that since the death of his majesty's father, he had doubtless received many letters from his friends in foreign countries who were sorry for him. As these letters would be stamped, the boy supposed the Czar would have quite a number of rare stamps. Perhaps his majesty would send him a few, as he was making a collection. It seemed absurd to send the letter, but as the boy had taken so much trouble in writing it, and it could do no harm, it was dropped in the mail. The boy was warned, however, that he must not be disappointed if he received no answer. It seemed unlikely that it would reach the hands of the Emperor. A few days ago, however, the mail brought a bulky package, addressed to the boy. It contained a large number of stamps of all nationalities. The simple, childish missive had evidently pleased its illustrious recipient, and its request was granted. One may hope that when the boy grows up and is in need of blessings which only the King of kings can give, he may remember his boyhood's experience, and follow the Apostolic advice:

Let us therefore come boldly unto the throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy and find grace to help in time of need. (Heb. 4:16.)

though she had ordinary clothing on, she waded out into the water. She went out as far as she dared and then, with all her might, she flung the life-preserver toward her father. He grasped it firmly and the men on the shore pulled him safely in. He was more dead than alive, when he came to the land, but he was carried to his cottage, where restoratives were applied and he is now fully recovered. He owes his life to his daughter's courage and devotion. It might be said that the men saved him, as it was they who pulled him out; or that he saved himself as his life depended on his firm grasp of the life-preserver. All were needed to his rescue. So it is in the salvation of the soul. Neither the work of Christ in the Atonement, nor the preaching of the Gospel can save the sinner, unless he takes hold for himself of the means of salvation:

Therefore, whether it was I or they, so we preach and so ye believed. (1 Cor. 15:11.)

Fired by a Spark.

A remarkable fatality is reported from Yonkers, N. Y. There is a quarry about four miles from that town at which a large number of men are employed. They have been doing some blasting lately, and had a quantity of powder on hand to continue the work. When the rainy weather set in they removed the remainder of the powder to the blacksmith's shop, which has been built near the quarry for sharpening their tools. The blacksmith was cautioned against lighting a fire while the cans of powder were there. He took care not to do that, but on June 25, he went to the it pss, and those who saw it coming turned into stores or doorways to escape it. At the junction of Forty-second Street it turned west. A crowd was following it shouting "mad dog." Suddenly, the cur turned round on its pursuers and started back toward Broadway. The crowd scattered quickly, leaving a clear passage for the frenzied creature. It ran down the street, badly scaring the people on the sidewalk, who ran anywhere for safety. The shouting crowd behind seemed to increase its fury. At the corner of an intersecting street the door of a store stood open, and the beast darted in. The proprietor jumped on his counter, out of its reach. The dog went straight through and leaped through a window into a rear yard, where its course was stopped. It lay down on a heap of rubbish panting and foaming. By this time a policeman had been found, who was taken to the window, from which he could see the dog. A bullet from his revolver soon put it out of its misery. The terror of the people was quite natural. They knew that if they were bitten by the dog, the virus from his bite might permeate the system and cause them to die of hydrophobia. They were therefore wise in getting out of its way. It is much to be wished that people showed similar wisdom in the avoidance of evil, which, when it enters the soul, leads to eternal death.

And sin, when it is finished, bringeth forth death. (James 1:15.)

An Invisible Partner.

The head of a large wholesale house in Chicago related a few days ago to the reporter of a daily journal the fact of a is a Brand from the Burning.

THE little missionary has a sweet, tender face, homely in the old sense of carrying about a look of mother-brooding and sister-loving, and her eyes are quick to answer yours with tears or smiles as you need sympathy in sorrow or joy. A dear and tireless worker she is, Miss Emily McGonigle, and I have known her long; known her as she goes about our city streets intent on doing good, now showing a mother how to cut and baste a child's frock, now helping to make a pudding, again hushing a fretful infant, and still again reading the Word of Life to a kind old lady. It is always one of the best old chapters, a Psalm, or a bit from Isaiah, or a golden page of Revelation, or some tender message of the Master's very own, that Miss Emily chooses when she reads the Bible.

She had been holding a prayer-meeting in a little chapel in a certain crowded neighborhood, one summer evening, when she said good-night to one and another of her friends, she became aware of a woman lingering by the door, reluctant to go away. Drawing nearer, she recognized her face. It was that of Mrs. Garrish, a Scotch woman, and a very nice, sensible body, the mother of her little Sunday school scholar, Margaret Ann. Other little maids were called Maggie or Annie, but his blue-eyed little woman insisted on other her Christian names, and was the only Margaret Ann in the school.

"You are wanting to speak with me?" said Miss Emily to Mrs. Garrish.

"Yes, ma'am," the woman exclaimed, breaking into sobs between her talk. "Yes, ma'am, it's himself, my man, Robbie, that must tell you about. He fell from a scaffolding where he was painting a house, and he's hurt internally, and the doctor says he'll not last long. It may not be to-morrow, nor yet next week, but Robbie's struck with death, and my heart's reakin'!"

"But, dear," urged the missionary, "don't give up this way. I've seen very sick people get well."

"Not sick people like my Robbie," said Mrs. Garrish, "and, oh! Miss Emily, the worst yit is, Robbie's as hard as a stone. He's angry at God, and he'll not see a minister, nor hear a word, nor let Margaret Ann study her book, or say her prayers where he is. Robbie is set in his way, and he'll die and go away from me, and I'll never see him more."

"Dear," answered the missionary, "do you mind the hymn I read to you all to-night?"

There's a wideness in God's mercy,
Like the wideness of the sea.

"Go you home, dear; I'll be round to see you promiscuous-like to-morrow morning. And I'm sure," she added, "God'll not let Robert Garrish slip out of his hand into the adversary's clutches."

Bright and early the next day the little missionary appeared at the door of Mrs. Garrish's apartment. She had a bunch of roses in her hand, and the glow of them and the scent of them pervaded the small kitchen where Mrs. Garrish was ironing. Margaret Ann was of course at school.

After the interchange of a few sentences, Miss Emily said:

"And how is the good man to-day? He's in there I see in the bed-room. You'll let me step in and see him, as I'm Margaret Ann's teacher."

In she went. The man pallid with suffering, gaunt, thin, hollowed-eyed, shaken, a man with the blue eyes and red hair of Scotland, stared at her as she entered.

"I've brought you some roses," she said, "hearing you were sick, I thought you might like them. And I'm Margaret Ann's teacher; a bonnie little lassie as ever lived is Margaret Ann, and you've a right to be proud of her."

The hollow eyes glinted as when a sunbeam flecks a lake. "Yes," came the answer, "Margaret Ann's a good child."

The thin white fingers hard with toil caressed the roses.

"My mother loved flowers," he said.

"I always fancy," the missionary spoke very softly, "that our Father in heaven must have a corner up there, where he makes the pattern roses, that these are like; we cannot doubt his loving-kindness when we see the great pains he takes to make these beautiful things to cheer us. We get away from it, and forget it, and scorn it, but the love is there all the time."

"My mother thought so," said the man.

"I—don't—know."

I've been a sinful man."

"While

we were yet sinners, Christ died for us," was the missionary's gentle answer.

"God so loved the world, that he sent his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but should have everlasting life."

The first visit was followed by others. Every day Miss

Emily went to see the Garrishes.

Every day she won a little farther, by God's grace, into the confidence of the stricken husband and father now drawing near to death.

At last, one hot stifling night, she was sent for in great haste. As she climbed the stair and entered the room, the family, wife, child, sister, brother, in a sorrowful, hushed group encircled the bed, where already brooded the majesty of death.

It was clear to all that the passing soul was not unhappy. A light as from the gates ajar had touched it, and there shone a strange glory on the white drawn countenance.

"Mr. Garrish," said the missionary,

"before you go, will you say the creed with me, and with us all here met."

They joined hands.

In that little chamber sounded sweet and solemn the hallowed words, which have comforted the saints of all ages, "I believe in God the Father Almighty, and in Jesus Christ, his Son, our Lord."

Sentence by sentence they repeated it all, and then joined in the dear petitions of the Lord's prayer.

"Are you trusting him to save you?"

said the missionary.

"I have no other trust," said the dying man. "Christ is strong enough to take me over, he shows me the light."

And so, out of this darkness into the perfect peace of heaven went Robert Garrish.

Native Workers for India.

This is the Greatest Need of the Mission Field—Mr. and Mrs. Nikambe's Work.

AMONG the notable foreigners actively engaged in Christian work abroad, and visiting the United States at the present time, there are few more picturesque or interesting personalities that the Rev. Madhavarav Nikambe, of India, and Mrs. Shevantibai Nikambe, his devoted wife and co-worker. Mr. Nikambe, who is a Hindu Christian Presbyterian minister of Bombay, is now visiting Western Christian lands for the express purpose of observing the methods applied in Gospel, philanthropic, and educational work. He is a convert from Hinduism, having been baptized by the Rev. C. Harding, of the American Marathi Mission, Sholapur, at the age of fifteen, amidst much persecution. He received his education at the Government and Presbyterian educational institutions. In 1884 he was ordained pastor over the Native Church at Bombay by the Presbytery at Bombay. After ten years' faithful service in that capacity, he will now devote his time to evangelistic work among his countrymen. He is also a Vice-President of the Y.M.C.A. Native Christian Branch at Bombay, a member of the Committee of the Religious Tract Society, and the Bible Society, and a Committee member of the West India Native Christian Union.

Mrs. Shevantibai Nikambe is of the third generation of Christians in India, and is the daughter of a government officer. Shevantibai is a matriculate of the Bombay University, being one of the first Hindu ladies who went up for that examination in the Presidency, and has been engaged in educational work among the Brahmin and other high caste ladies of Bombay for the past ten years. For five years she has conducted with great success her own school for child-wives in Bombay. Mrs. Nikambe is on the Committee of the Y. M. C. A. Marathi Branch, and the late Secretary of the W. C. T. U. of Bombay, Hindu Christian Branch.

In a recent interview with one of the editors of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Mr. Nikambe gave some account of his own work in Bombay and of the progress of Gospel work in India generally. He said:

"I went to a missionary school as a boy and there got the light of Christianity. I made my intentions known to my parents, and they were very much put out about it, and for about four months did not allow me to have anything to do with Christians. At last I had to run away from home in order to be baptized. I was then fifteen years old. I then went to Poona for an English education, and from there to Bombay to attend college, where I studied for the ministry, and on April 24, 1884, was ordained. I began work in Bombay in connection with the Free Church of Scotland's mission, and I was pastor of a native church in Bombay about eleven years, until July, 1894. I thought I would like to visit Christian countries to get more experience. We have seen some Christian work in Scotland, in England, and now in America. My parents were not Christians; I was born of Hindoo parents, who remained so until death. In my church I have about a hundred and sixty church members and ninety-seven communicants. Some of our converts are doing good work. We have Sunday Schools and native teachers, and I preach in my own language, Marathi, and occasionally in English.

"Polygamy," Mr. Nikambe explained, "does not prevail so largely in Bombay as it does in some other parts of India. A man may marry any number of wives in that country and there is no law to prevent it." The hope of the conversion of India, he declares, rests largely with the native church. The function of the missionary societies is to train the native preachers, but the hope of the conversion of the people and the initiation of an aggressive movement must rest with the native church. Christians in India will need missionaries a long time yet. The customs of India are so totally different from those in America, the language is so strange and the population so vast that it is not reasonable to expect so large reinforcements of missionaries and means as would be necessary for the conversion of the nation. This view is confirmed by the reports of the Missionary Boards. "We want the Missionary Societies to teach us to walk by ourselves," said Mr. Nikambe. "Their highest function is to train a native ministry and to help us establish a self-supporting native church, with native Christian leaders throughout the country, so that we can go among our own people and preach the Gospel. We want missionaries of all kinds—evangelical, educational, medical, industrial. There is no fear of the native preachers lapsing into heterodoxy."

How to make the church self-supporting is an important problem. The people, as they are, cannot be self-supporting. Many of the Hindu converts lose their means of livelihood when they become Christians. If there is a carpenter who becomes a Christian, (as a Hindu, he has his customers among his own caste), he loses his customers. They say to him: "You have become unclean; we cannot have anything to do with you, we will have a carpenter of our caste," and so he finds it hard to get along. Thus the people lose caste, whether high or low, when they become Christians, and likewise their business connections. That is why the native churches need assistance. There is a great need of industrial missionaries to help the converts to become self-supporting, and to give an industrial training to the native Christian youths. There is a reluctance on the part of missionary societies to give prominence and authority to the native converts. A little encouragement would induce them to make efforts for their own support.

Concerning her own work among the young girls and women, Mrs. Nikambe said: "I have not found any difficulty in getting the girls to come to school, but it is a very hard matter to reach the women, if one does not know their language. I just explain matters in their own way, tell them why girls should be educated, and why they should come to school, and then they feel attracted. Our people are not anxious for girls to be educated, so one has to be very cautious, and put matters to them in their own way. The girls must be married, the Hindu scriptures say, before they are ten. Then the girl goes to the husband's house, and his family control her. They object to their wives going to ordinary school, but I have got many to come to mine, which is specially for wives and widows. I have been working among the high caste Hindu wives for ten years. Where the girls do not attend school, they grow up in ignorance. In India the women control the homes just as they do here. The Hindu wife influences her husband. She has the key of the Hindu religion there. The husband respects his wife, and she, being ignorant, is quite contented with her position."

Mrs. Nikambe's work among the wives and widows of India is mainly supported by Christian people in different countries who have taken a deep spiritual interest in its progress. Some of the girls pay a fee, but it is merely nominal. She has about seventy pupils in all, their ages varying from ten to twenty-two years. All are married, even the youngest among them. If a girl in India remains unmarried after her tenth year, her parents feel that they are disgraced. Her efforts have already been productive of much good both in a spiritual and educational sense.

Advice to Politicians.

WE hope the day will come when Christian men will have charge of the ballot-box. It at present wants cleaning inside and out. It is black and filthy. There have been unclean hands pushing it about for a good while. We are glad to know that the old crop of politicians are dying off very fast. They were a desperate race, and their reformation was impossible. We wish that consecrated Christian men would take charge of public affairs. The trouble is that when good men go into politics they do not take their religion with them. We, therefore, now that an exciting election is approaching, volunteer them a little advice. First, do not lie. There will be every temptation for you to say untrue things about the opposing candidate, and your country newspaper may yield to falsehood. But do not surrender your own veracity. All the good you have done before the campaign opens, and all the good you will do after it has closed, will be no excuse for present mendacity. Secondly, do not drink. When you are out electioneering, and get your feet wet, and the night is chill, you may be allured to take ardent spirits. When you cannot get a man to vote right, you will be tempted to invite him to the neighboring bar, knowing that a man's heart is not far removed from his stomach. One of the worst effects of election day is the fact that it leaves so many men damaged of strong drink. Thirdly, do not swear. Even Christian men, in hot political contests, are apt to use the name of God rhetorically. Beware! When you employ that over-emphatic phrase, your Sunday School boys may hear it, and the men who do not believe in sobriety of speech will copy your bad example. Scowl as much as is necessary, and bring down your foot very hard, and gesticulate wildly, but do not swear. Let all politicians, especially Christian politicians, pray for help to keep right side up till after next November.

The "Sluckkak Wukkk."

THE King of Burmah wants an English editor for a paper to be published under the patronage of His Majesty. The salary is to be twelve thousand pounds a year. The King, however, that if said editor publishes anything obnoxious to the native Government he shall be punished on the bottom of the foot with five hundred strokes from the "Sluckkak wukkk." We have no idea what that weapon is, but are very sure from the sound of the name that it must be something dreadful. We have decided not to enter candidacy for that editorial position. Newspaper men in all lands are exposed to dirks and canes, and cowhides, and had better be careful; but this is the first time any of our craft have been threatened with the Sluckkak wukkk. We hope the King of Burmah may never get a newspaper! He deserves not such a glorious boon. We know of two or three editors who ought to have a short treatment of "cat-o-nine-tails" on the back, but none of them would we have exposed to five hundred strokes on the bottom of the foot from this fearful Sluckkak wukkk.

Yet how shall unprincipled newspaper men be reformed? They sit down and write things they do not believe. They despise the right. Their paper is a pestilence, smiting the house into which it comes. They put the fall of good men in capital letters, and write double-headed editorials magnifying the frailties of Christian men, while the triumphs of the kingdom of God are printed in nonpareil. They are impervious to any moral influence. After all, perhaps you had better try on them a few whacks of the Sluckkak wukkk.

The Sunday School Wave.

WE congratulate Christian people on the cessation of much of the Sunday School nonsense with which the land has been afflicted. For a long while there has been a mania on the Sabbath School question, showing itself in doggerel hymns, clap-trap, and superfluous religious machinery, which made the Sabbath a frolic rather than an improvement to the souls of the young. The Church is tired of this, and there is now coming up another wave of Sabbath School interest, which means the sound education and eternal salvation of our youthful populations. Sabbath Schools are a failure unless they secure an everlasting result. We want consecrated men and women to teach. Masculine teachers who sit twirling their whiskers so as to look handsome before the young ladies, and feminine teachers who spend half the Sabbath School hour in adjusting their fine millinery, are not fit for the revived and earnest Sabbath School of to-day. We believe that the last few years have reconstructed this institution. It has at last taken its place where it belongs, not as a mere Sabbath amusement, but a grand, aggressive, all-conquering influence for redeeming the world.

Tobacco Juice.

CONSIDERABLE admiration has been expressed for the fact that a Methodist Church sued and recovered eight dollars from a man who defiled the floor of the meeting-house by expectorations of tobacco. We like that movement of the Methodists for clean floors; but how much grander the crusade if we could also clean the mouths of the people of this loathsome stuff. We never want to hear a man lecture about the evils of rum if his breath smells of tobacco. We think it inconsistent for a minister of the Gospel to preach of purity when he has from day to day to balance himself cautiously lest there be from his lips an overflow of yellow slobber. The time was when it was thought a concomitant of orthodoxy for a minister to use the Virginia weed. The times of such ignorance God winked at; but now he commandeth all tobacco smokers and spitters to repent. We greet these brethren with the following advice: Go out into the field or back yard, take the cud of tobacco out of your mouth and throw the wad under the fence, and get your dog or cat to scratch something over the uncleanness and bury it out of sight forever.

Let all Christian reformers know that there is something in tobacco that seems to excite thirst for strong drink. Multitudes of men have not yet discovered the tunnel of their own pipe. We know of many young men who seemed to be reformed from the habits of intoxication, who went back first to tobacco and then to the wine flask. Get a new toothbrush, have some fresh water brought from the spring, and for one hour submit gum and tongue and roof of mouth to scouring and absolution. Thus, at last come out a regenerated man, having not only a clean soul, but a pure body.

Camp-Meetings.

SOON the Methodists will be shaking out their tents and packing their lunch-baskets and buying their railroad and steamboat tickets for the camp-meeting grounds. Again the five thousand sit down on the grass and have surplus of provision to take home to those who were too stupid to go. From the arrangement being made for these meetings in July and August, we judge there will be so much consecrated enthusiasm that there may be danger that some morning, as the sun strikes gloriously through the ascending mist, our friends may all go up in a chariot of fire, leaving the churches in a bereft condition. If they do go up in that way, may their mantle or their straw hat fall this way! Why not have all our churches and denominations take a summer airing? The breath of the pine woods or a wrestle with the waters would put an end to everything like morbid religion. One reason why the Apostles had such healthy theology is that they went a-fishing. We would like to see the day when we will have Presbyterian camp-meetings, and Episcopal camp-meetings, and Baptist camp-meetings, and Congregational camp-meetings, or what would be still better, when, forgetful of all minor distinctions, we could have a Church Universal camp-meeting. We would like to help plant the tent-pole for such a convocation.

Tell It.

THE truth plainly told always makes a stir. The truth is a strong and jagged thing, and it crashes ahead across prejudices and ambitions and expectations. A lie is a weak thing and soon comes to post mortem. Tell the full round truth about anything, and you have immediate agitation. Weak people avoid the truth, and bad people hate it. But in the end truth shall win; in fact truth always comes out ahead:

Truth, crushed to earth, shall rise again,
The eternal years — — — — —

There! we came near reciting that hackneyed quotation.

* * *

This is peculiarly the season of travel, when thousands of American tourists are viewing the sights of picturesque Europe, from the North Cape to the Mediterranean, and when other thousands, with probably equal good taste and certainly with more patriotism, are becoming acquainted with the natural beauties of our own land. It is doubtful if there is anything in the Old World which can be contrasted with the natural glories of Colorado, the splendor of its cascades, the grandeur of its giant mountains, and the loveliness of its wooded valleys and beautiful parks. Any one who has ever visited the "Garden of the Gods"—that marvelous region, where titanic forces have expressed themselves in grandly fantastic fashion—can never forget it. It is reached by a carriage-road from Manitou, two miles distant. Some of the strange rock formations found there are like towers, and others like the spires of some cathedral, while some are so full of the suggestion of beasts, birds or the figures of mythology, that the name "Garden of the Gods" seems not inappropriate. Great natural gateways, in solid rock, as though hewn out by titans, and buttressed by the adamantine rocks; conical pillars with curious flat tops, suggesting a corps of giant, white-capped chefs standing around; rocks, some shaped like Cleopatra's needle, some like beehives, one like an anvil, and still others like human faces, are plentiful. It is nature's show-ground, and should be visited by all who desire to see the wonder-spot of America. There is nothing like it elsewhere in the whole world.

BRIEF NOTES.

Bishop W. X. Ninde, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, succeeds Bishop James N. FitzGerald as President of the Epworth League.

At the Recent Conference of the International Missionary Union at Clifton Springs, N. Y., almost unanimous opinion of the missionaries found to be that the sending of converts to Christian lands to be educated was undesirable.

An English Journal Summarizing the Recently published statistical reports of the Government says that the money spent in the United Kingdom in liquor last year amounted to $710,000,000, and money spent on tobacco and cigars to $750,000.

The Christian Alliance Convention will be held at Old Orchard, Me., July 25 to Aug. 10, expected that the offerings for Foreign Missions year will exceed even the unprecedented sum raised at the meeting last year.

Rev. C. A. Towle, who has had charge of the Congregational Sunday School work in Iowa the past ten years, says that thirty-three churches have grown out of Sunday Schools in the State during that time, and that twenty of them have already cured houses of worship.

The West End Baptist Church of Brooklyn, N. Y., had the pleasure of welcoming its new pastor last Sunday. He is Rev. M. B. Russell, of New York City. He has just graduated from Columbia University, and comes to the Brooklyn church, the brightest prospects of usefulness.

Rev. Jacob Freshman, D. D., has been preaching at Central Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. He is now at liberty to accept temporary or permanent preaching engagements with theological churches. His address is Post Office Station O, New York City.

Evangelist John H. Elliott has been laboring in the new State of Washington. A correspondent writes that at both Tacoma and Spokane the results from his meetings have been most blessed. Some of the services over two thousand persons were present. At Spokane four hundred persons made profession of faith.

The Present Condition of Japan is Represented in a recent report by a Unitarian Missionary as "a nation with idols shattered—but a nation unfused and not growing spiritually." He thinks that all the native religions, except possibly a progressive phase of Buddhism, have lost their power of the people.

A Correspondent of The Interior, Writing from Cherokee, Iowa, says: The evangelistic meetings held at this place under the leadership of Dr. Williams of Atlanta, Ga., closed lately after a three weeks' session, and as result of these meetings, twelve hundred and five hundred people were converted. As this town has a population of only 3200 we think this is remarkable work.

Dr. Griffith John, the Famous Missionary, China, calls attention in the London "Christian" to the statistics recently published by the Chinese "Recorder," which estimates the number of communicants in the Protestant Churches of the Empire at seventy thousand. The basis of calculation is the record of 1893 which was fifty-five thousand. In 1842 there were only six native Christians in China.

The Salvation Army Held a Special Meeting of Divisional Officers in New York last week which the organization was announced of two new departments. These are the League of Love, a Rescue work among women and the Knights of Hope for rescue work among men. The workers in the former department are to be called "angels," and part of their duties will be to collect funds for their work.

A New Society Organized to Resist the American Protective Association generally known by its initials A. P. A., is the American Order of United Catholics. It is intended that its members shall encourage each other in business, in society in politics and assist each other in obtaining employment. Thus the A. O. U. C. and the A. P. A. will confront each other as the Orangemen and Catholics do in Ireland, but it may be hoped, in with like results.

The President of a New York Bank having occasion to select from a large number of applicants a young man for a position of trust, gave to each a paper containing the following questions, answer to which they were asked to fill in: 1. What church do you attend? 2. What Sunday School, and who is your teacher? 3. Where do you spend your evenings? 4. Who are your associates? 5. Do you ever use intoxicating drinks or tobacco? The young man appointed was the one who gave the most satisfactory answers.

Dr. Durand of the Christian Mission of Hindu Central Provinces, India, announces that he has found in the poisonous fungus of Engotia cuneata the leprosy. In the early stages of the disease, he says, it is a sure cure and he has been able to arrest the disease with it, even at so late a stage as when the fingers or toes have been lost. The discovery has caused a great sensation in the medical schools to which Dr. Durand has sent a report of his experiments and a philosophical explanation of the principle on which it operates.

The Presbyterian Board of Relief has Reluctantly accepted the resignation of Dr. William J. Cattell, who has served as its Secretary for nearly twelve years but whose health has now become so feeble that he can no longer perform the duties of the office. The resolution accepting the resignation says: "As an officer, the Board testifies to the great efficiency of Dr. Cattell in every direction in which the work of the Board calls for effort. He has done the work of the Board nobly and faithfully, and the trust that has been committed to him. His whole being has been given to it, and the profiting has appeared on every side."

The Slaveholders in Madagascar were Concerned about the Island, becoming a French Colony because the Constitution of France forbids slavery holding in all its dominions. M. Lebon, the Minister for the Colonies, was examined on the question by a Legislative Committee. He declared that Madagascar was not a French colony, and that the application to the island of the laws of France, including the law pertaining to the abolition of slavery. The government, however, reserved to itself the right of promulgating this law at the time which it deemed fitting, in order that the situation might not be complicated by a too hurried application of its provisions. Slavery in the island accordingly has another lease of life.

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

L. Rome, Ia. If one sin after conversion, and repent and ask for God's forgiveness through Christ, may we believe that those sins are pardoned, or must public confession be made?

most cases public confession is unnecessary. If, however, the sin has been public and conspicuous, the repentance should be equally public. A wrong done to another should be confessed, and restitution be made when that is possible.

S. S. Beaumont, Kan. 1. Who discovered the first Neptune? 2. Is the fate of the unprofitable servant mentioned in Luke 17: 10, the same as the unprofitable servant of Matt. 25: 30? 3. Explain Heb. 10: 26, 27. 4. Where can the Bible Dictionary, and The Imitation of Christ, and the Parables be obtained?

Galle of Berlin was the first to see it. Lamer and Adams formed the opinion from the disturbance of Uranus in its orbit that such a planet existed, and asked Dr. Galle to look for it. 2. No, the unprofitable servant of Luke is faithful servant who does his duty, but claims merit, while he of Matthew is a servant who does not do his duty, and is punished, while the other is rewarded. 3. Simply the provision for the salvation of humankind in this life is exhausted. If Christ's sacrifice does not avail, nothing will. 4. The Bible Dictionary is published by Porter & Coates, Philadelphia. Several publishers publish The Imitation. Any bookseller can procure a copy for you. Taylor's Parables is published by A. Armstrong & Son, New York.

Rev. H. Cornelison, Jr., Malvern, Mo. Kindly send any information concerning organization of a Boys' Brigade, which may be at your disposal. I read with interest in your account of this work in issue of June 10, but I wish details with view to work in my town.

F. full instructions, write to M. W. M. Foster, office of The Kosack, Chicago, Ill.

G. Stewart, Wis. I heard the statement that there was not one theological school open to women in our country. Is it correct or not?

It is correct. There are several. Including the Moody Theological School at Northfield, the Bible Institute of Chicago, Taylor University at Upland, Ind., and others.

L. H. Champoag, Oreg. Is there a man in the statement that John Wesley, when he was too old to tear down the sect he was old, said they were all wrong?

It is one of those stories which even delight to invent concerning the children of God for the purpose of discrediting religion. As to the latest day of his life, John Wesley did not abate his zealous efforts for the extension of Christ's kingdom. He preached his last sermon only ten days before he died, and when on his death-bed, his peace was perfect and his faith triumphant. He was confident that the work he had done was blessed and would bear abundant fruit.

Rev. Whalen, Stetson, Mich. 1. Who was James Lervey? 2. When was the use of the letter "f" discontinued?

He was a famous English divine, born in 1717. Hervey became acquainted with John Wesley at Oxford, and received there his first impressions of religion. While he was curate of Bideford he wrote his celebrated Devotions and Contemplations about 1746, and in 1747 he wrote Contemplations on the Light and Starry Heavens, and A Winter's Day. His Theron and Aspadia, a series of dialogues written in 1755, also obtained wide popularity. He died in 1788. 2. Early in the present century it was still in use, especially where the double "s" occurred, but it was gradually discontinued during the first quarter of the century in printing, although in legal and other writing it is still to be found. It is now a mere, quaint affectation, however.

M. K., Painesville, O. My sister and myself, desiring to do something for the Master, have made some dresses. We would like them to reach the squalid poor—those who live in alleys and tenement houses—the children, whom you send to Mont-Lawn. If you can make use of them, I will send them next week, charges prepaid; seven new calico dresses for girls from five to eleven years old.

His gift from these good Ohio friends for the little guests at Mont-Lawn is welcome, as it will be very much appreciated. It is astonishing what a quantity of clothing—woolen dresses, single garments and odd pieces—our children can make use of in a single summer, to supply only what is obviously necessary. We wish our friends would remember this and that garments in good condition, suitable for boys from five to ten and girls from five to twelve, can be put to the very best use by Miss Collins, the superintendent of our Children's Home at Mont-Lawn, Nyack, N. Y.

D. W. H., Chickasaw, Iowa. What caused the split in the Prohibition Party?

A difference of opinion as to the expediency of taking up the financial question and making a declaration concerning it in the platform.

E. W. L., Anderson, Ark. 1. Who founded the first Sunday School, and where and when? 2. Do you think there was any Sunday School in Bible times? 3. Do you think there was any corn in Bible times? Many say that when the Bible speaks of corn it means wheat.

1. Robert Raikes of Gloucester, England, in May or June 1784, founded the modern Sunday School. 2. Yes, in all probability there were Sunday Schools or their equivalent even in the earliest times. Dr. H. Clay Trumbull, who has made a very exhaustive study of the subject, propounds a very ingenious theory in support of the claim that Bible Schools—the equivalent of our Sunday Schools—existed in the earliest Bible times. He states that Jewish tradition makes Methuselah a teacher of religion before the Flood and that Abraham, Melchisedec, Shem, Eber, Joshua, Samuel, Elisha and Hezekiah were in the long list of Bible School leaders. There are, of course, church. If used for exercise or pleasure, it is a sin and a desecration of the Lord's Day.

Inquirer, East Lynn, Ill. Will you please tell me the names of the different books written by Dr. Talmage and where I can purchase them? Especially where can I purchase The Pathway of Life and at what price?

Dr. Talmage's works are contained in a number of volumes of sermons, essays and miscellaneous writings, which within the last twenty years or more have been produced by various publishers in different places. His books, From Manger to Throne, and The Pathway of Life, were issued as premiums to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. The edition of The Pathway of Life is exhausted, and no more copies can be had. There are, however, a few copies of From Manger to Throne still left, and these will be sent to any address, postage prepaid, for $1 per copy. This offer, it should be understood, will only hold good as long as the supply lasts. We frequently receive such inquiries, and the offer is taken advantage of two months afterward, when it is entirely too late. Dr. Talmage's new book The Earth Girdled, is now in the market.

Inquirer, N. J. Will Dr. Talmage preach at Ocean Grove this summer?

He will preach at the Grove on Sunday, August 30.

L. S., Slaterville, N. Y. 1. Does not Isaiah 58: 13 imply a special blessing on those who keep the Sabbath? 2. Is the soul immortal without Christ?

1. The prophet appears to be reproving those who regarded the Sabbath as a burden and a deprivation. It was made so by the minute and ridiculous ordinances of Jewish teachers. They made absurd regulations about it such as that a man must not carry a hand-

Church may be, but on general principles it would seem very illiberal to reject such a certificate. If the evidences of conversion had satisfied the Methodists, it would seem that they should be satisfactory to the Presbyterians. There may be circumstances affecting the question that we do not know of, but it appears to us that the Presbyterian Church should not require more of any person before admitting him to fellowship, than the Methodist Church requires.

Subscriber, Banker, Mich. 1. Does the Church of the Disciples believe in the Divinity of Christ? 2. Will other Christian Churches accept members of that Church and admit them to membership if they present letters of dismissal?

1. As the Disciples reject all creeds and confessions of faith as of human origin and have no creed but the Bible, it is possible that there are Unitarians and Socinians among them; but we believe that the great majority are firm believers in the Divinity of Christ. 2. Probably a member of the Disciples' Church applying for membership in another denomination, would be asked questions as to his belief, because he might hold doctrines not in harmony with those of the Church to which he applies. The fact of his being a member of the Disciples' Church might not of itself be sufficient to entitle him to admission without some definite statement of his attitude on particular questions, but it is not likely there would be an examination conducted in a hostile spirit.

Believer, McCallsburg, Iowa. Do you think a loss of peace and joy indicates that there has been some sin committed?

Not of itself. Many truly converted persons, some very eminent, have lost peace and joy for a time. In your own case, it would appear, from the circumstances you describe, that you have been looking to your own feelings for your basis of comfort and hope. This experience may be permitted as a discipline to you. God offers you salvation on certain conditions. If you comply with those conditions, he will keep his word and will save you. You will be saved because of Christ having made atonement, and because you believe in him and put your trust in him; not because you feel this or that. Do not entertain doubts or encourage them. You may depend on Christ saying you if you give yourself into his keeping and live as he commands. To doubt that would imply a doubt of his veracity, and would be an insult to him.

F. and A. M., Philadelphia. In THE MAIL-BAG you say there is no ground for hope that the condition of the impenitent will be changed after death. Does not that limit God's mercy? If a lost soul repents anywhere in creation will not God admit him to the mansions prepared?

Our answer did not limit God's mercy, because we did not presume to say what he would do in the circumstances. We said that he had given no ground for hope. It was not necessary that he should do so. The Bible is for men in this life and the offer of salvation is made to them here. If they reject it, hoping that another opportunity will be afforded them, they do so at their own risk, as there is no assurance given by him in his word that there will be such an opportunity.

S. S. Teacher, Topeka, Kans. Do you consider the children in our Sunday Schools are likely to be benefited by the study of the life of David on which we are about to enter in the International Course?

The lessons should be taught so as to give practical principles. If you can show the children that David, when placed in difficult circumstances, honestly strove to do right, you may easily make the lessons beneficial. The temptations of modern life differ in form from those that beset the warrior king, but they are the same in their essence, and have to be met in the same way by faith and prayer.

Rev. J. Albers, Chatsworth, Ill. The list is too long for reproduction here. Write to Geo. P. Rowell, New York.—L. E. S., Topeka, Kan. Certainly there is no law to prevent your keeping Saturday holy. If you can keep every day holy, so much the better, but we hope you will show your love for the Master by honoring the day on which Christendom commemorates every week his resurrection.—J. A. many who will not accept this interpretation of the offices of these prophets and public leaders. Nearly a century before the Christian era, according to Dr. Trumbull's claim, a series of uniform Bible lessons was in general use throughout Palestine. 3. The word so translated in the English version of the Scriptures can be properly used to mean grain of any kind. It is never intended to mean Indian corn or maize, which is thought to have been unknown to the ancients.

Mrs. J. K. Overocker, Schraalenburg, N. J. The Sunbeam Mission Band have raised $25 which I send you to be used for the Children's Home at Mont-Lawn. Some day they would like to visit the Home. They will bring their own lunches and would like to know if you have any woods or grove you could allow them to eat in?

The Children's Home is already open and the Sunbeam Mission Band will be welcomed any day they may choose to visit us. There are seventy acres more of wood and grove and lawn, and they are at perfect liberty to romp about and eat and rest where they please; though we will take pleasure in placing a cool corner of our big tent at their service.

Reader, Port Jervis, N. Y. 1. Which are the three most beautiful cities in the world? 2. Which are the three most beautiful cities in the United States? 3. Do you consider it wrong for a Christian to ride a bicycle on Sunday, if he attends church and rides the bicycle after church for exercise?

1. Rome, Athens, Venice, Naples, Paris, Damascus have each laid claim to the proud distinction. The choice probably lies in the order named. 2. Washington would probably be accorded first place, but it would be difficult to decide on the merits as to the second. 3. It is excusable if used as a matter of necessity, where there are no other means of traveling to kerchief on that day, because that would be to carry a burden. The prophet wanted them to call the Sabbath a delight and keep it in the spirit rather than in the letter. Christ's own teaching on the subject was of the same kind. Our observance of the Lord's Day should be of that character though an effort is often made to turn it into bondage. 2. The assurances of eternal life through Christ, have led many eminent men to believe that there could not be any life after death apart from him. Whately of Dublin, R. W. Dale of Birmingham, Edward White of London, and many in our own land have held that belief. The general opinion of the Evangelical churches, however, is that the soul possesses inherent immortality. The essential thing for us is to accept Christ who promises that those who believe on him shall have eternal life.

M. E. H., Ambler, Pa. Does the answer to "Anxious Wife" in your issue of June 17, imply that you believe baptism by immersion to be essential to salvation?

The answer simply implies that in that particular case it seems essential to domestic harmony. We expressed no opinion on the other subject. It seemed to us that if the husband thought that the wife could not be saved without it, she had better satisfy his scruples and remove his apprehensions by submitting to the rite. It could do no harm and, if as it appeared, he thought it would do good, there would be no sin in her yielding to his wish. The Apostle Paul had to deal with people of that kind. See I. Cor. 1: 11-18.

In a "Doby" Village Home.

Life in New Mexico, where Everything is Slow and Behind the Rest of the World.

IN these days of rapid traveling by land and water, when steam, electricity, and other forces of nature are harnessed for the service of man, it is amusing to find one's self in some out-of-the-way locality where such latter day improvements are as yet unknown. There are, of course, many sections of this vast Union where the railroad has not yet penetrated. In many Southern villages, the slow ox-team is still used, both for the field and the road. But if it is desired to reach a locality where time seems to travel "with leaden wings," and which seems to have slipped altogether out of the current of human progress and into an eddy, it is necessary to visit New Mexico. In many parts of that sun-baked land, the dwellers of to-day are living under conditions which are really a compromise between civilization and barbarism. Our photograph on this page gives a glimpse of life in one of the adobe villages of New Mexico. There is the slow, stooping native, his skin tanned to the hue of leather, standing beside his lazy ox-team. The animals seem to share the inertia of their master. So crude and clumsy a piece of workmanship as the heavy wooden wagon might well be relegated to some museum. There may originally have been strength in such a wagon when newly made, but it certainly looks as though, with the drying of the wood, it would prove a most disappointing and creaky vehicle. The framework it supports would indicate that it is used either for conveying cotton or corn, or some such product.

There is said to be only one really "doby" village in the United States. Both in New and Old Mexico, this peculiar style of architecture has been in use for centuries, being primitive, natural, and economical. Adobe bricks are large, flat cakes of sun-dried clay, and a town or village whose buildings are constructed of those materials, presents an Oriental appearance, the flat roofs, low doors, and narrow, infrequent windows recalling the buildings of Palestine, Syria, and Egypt. In New Mexican adobes, there is little danger of conflagration, since fires for cooking and other purposes are usually lighted in a small brick oven outside the house.

Of the "doby" dwellers, it must be admitted that, despite their poverty and their unprogressive character, they seem to be fairly contented and happy. It is the simple happiness of those whose minds have not yet opened to the wonders of the surrounding world. They have few, if any ambitions, and their social relaxations are confined to a few feasts and to the assembling for religious purposes.

Rev. C. K. Powell, a missionary of the Presbyterian Board, who has served in the New Mexico field, gives this interesting description of the social and spiritual aspects of life in an adobe village: Costilla is forty miles from the nearest point the railroad, and is on a plateau just over the Colorado line.

The plazas are built of the customary square adobe houses, all in a row, each man using his neighbor's wall for one of his own, the houses ranging around a court in the form of a square, with openings for exit on two sides, the village wall being in the centre of the plaza. The doors and usually all the windows open on this court. At our evening service we had the men sitting on boxes and chairs, and the women on sheep or goat-skin rugs on the floor. The singing was good, attention excellent, and as a work of preparation for the Sabbath following, was highly successful. Their dark faces and bright black eyes kindled with interest and joy as the truth was unfolded to them. After the meeting I had Mr. Rendon, an associate, speak for me to a Mexican peasant who said he had never before heard the Gospel, had never heard the Bible read, and had always been told that the Protestants used rattlesnakes and a he-goat in their incantations, which were, as he supposed, a necessary part of the service.

The Sewing-Women of China.

All along the streets, seamstresses may be seen wandering in search of work, or busy on their low stools, which, with a basket containing their threads, needles, etc., constitutes their sole outfit. These women are not remarkable for beauty, but they bear a good reputation. They are usually the wives of boatmen or men of that class, and have their homes in the stationary boats that line the mud-banks of the creeks and are used as dwellings by the poor. The work of these women is generally confined to "darning"; stitching and hemming being apparently unknown to them. Their idea of darning, too, is very primitive. But their skill, imperfect as it is, seems to meet the requirements of their patrons, and these sewing women are able to gain a livelihood.

A Fragrant Life.

There was a beautiful expression that was used regarding a young Christian lady, who recently went to the heavenly home: "Wherever she went lovely flowers sprang up in her path, and the air was sweeter when she had passed by." Such a tribute is far more precious than any mere eulogy. They describe in brief a pure and amiable Christian life that has been spent for others. Such a ministry of goodness is within the reach of every Christian. It requires no brilliant gifts, no large wealth. It is a ministry which the plainest, lowliest, and poorest may fulfill. Then its influence is simply incalculable.

Amusements to Eschew.

When a professed child of God goes to the feasts of Satan for entertainment, writes Rev. Wm Fawcett, of Chicago, when the theatre, the ballroom, or the gambling-saloon are his resorts for entertainment, he simply joins himself to the citizens of a far country, and his loss of manly estate is seen in his occupation. When a professed child of God is more interested in a social party than in a prayer-meeting, more attracted by a feverish novel than by the sanctuary or the Word of God, such a soul is but a spiritual tramp advertising his squandered fortune.

The Sweetness of Laughter.

A woman has no natural gift more bewitching than a sweet laugh, remarks a writer in the Home Queen. It is like the sound of flutes on the water. It leaps from her in a clear, sparkling rill, and the heart that hears it feels as if bathed in the cool

A PRINCESS WHO SPIN

WHEN the Princess of Wales was a girl, at home with her parents in Denmark, the life was very poor. The old was compelled to economize there were but small revenues attached to the Danish crown, and the Queen, like many other good housewives, had to be content with extremely plain house-keeping. But the three lovely and graceful daughters, appreciating the situation, resolved not to be behind their parents in helpfulness. Alexandra, the tallest and stateliest, spun the flax that many an article for use in the home. The girls could weave, knit, bake, cook, and sew, as well as sing, paint. No part of the domestic education was neglected; and as they arrived at young womanhood, their excellent qualifications became known, the leading princes in Europe vying with each other in paying them attention. They were unanimously pronounced three most perfectly educated and charming young women.

Even after her marriage the Princess Alexandra did not wholly neglect her beloved spinning-wheel, for she took a pleasure sitting down by it, as she used to do in the times in her father's castle. Recently, in order to help a charitable project in England, she busied herself with some spinners' goods, and her example stimulated others to a like industrious effort. A British poet, on seeing the Princess of Wales at the wheel, wrote a somewhat rhapsodical sonnet on the subject, beginning with these lines:

Spin on with flying wheel,
O lady fair,
And may the threads which
From the distaff twine
Beneath the royal fingers, swift combine exhilarating spring. Have you ever pursued an unseen fugitive through trees, led on by a fairy laugh, now here, now lost, now found? We have, and we have pursued that wandering voice to this day. Sometimes it comes to us in the midst of care, or sorrow, or irksome business, and then we turn away and listen and hear it ringing in the room like a silver bell. How much we owe to that sweet laugh!

The Queen of the House.

SHE rules with subtle art and skill
Excelling statesmen far,
And 'neath her changeful humors still
Her subjects loyal are;
No heart rebels against her sway,
Her actions meet no blame;
In all her moods from grave to gay
Her words attention claim.
Her tiny hands no sceptre hold,
No purple robe she wears,
Above her shining curls of gold
No diadem she bears;
But yet to her in beauty bright
Not Dido famed and fair,
Nor yet that queen, Troy's bane and blight,
Could ever once compare.
She owns no castle and no lands,
No ship, no warlike aid;
Yet ne'er an emperor's commands
As hers were so obeyed:
My little daughter, aged but four Short years, reigns royally
With pout and frown and laughter o'er
Her mother and o'er me.

The Important Trifles of Life.

Small things, little incidents, trifles, go to making up our lives, writes Rev. Stephen Merritt. Carelessness as to trifles leads to grievous falls; attention to trifles make us developed men or women. It is the little things, the minor duties that are constantly occurring that form our characters and augment our powers. If we despise the small, we shall fall by the small but if we are faithful in little, we shall be faithful in much. A word fitly spoken may seem a trifle, but it is full of joy and blessing; a trifling handshake may be a benediction; a cup of cold water shall not lose its reward. Little things are used of him; trifles tell. Accomplish the wee things well. Do your best; simply, sweetly, quietly, and quickly; do it not for self, but to the Lord. Strive, struggle not after great things; that is harmful, not helpful; that may be self-love and desire for applause, and is not pleasing to God.

Books and Reading.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor topic for the Week Beginning July 19. Rev. 3: 13-23; I. Tim. 4: 13.

A QUESTION that would elicit a wide variety of answers, if the truth were told in each case, would be, Why do you read? People do not ask themselves the question very often and many do not spend a great deal of time in reading nor do they know why they do so. It is to be feared that in many instances there is no other motive than amusement. The statistics of our libraries and the record of the booksellers indicate, by the extent of the demand for novels, that a large proportion of the reading public belong to this class. Another motive which has a wide influence is the love of gossip and scandal. The newspapers are perfectly well aware of this fact and exert themselves to gratify the appetite. The columns devoted to sayings and doings of some interesting murderer, giving full and particular account of his early life and especially of the minute details of his crime, are a pabulum of this kind. The records of the courts especially of the divorce court are more of the species of scandal and are widely read. It is necessary, we are assured, to keep abreast with the events of the day and these events agreeably tickle our palates. Then there are those people who read to acquire information—a much smaller class, particularly if it is limited to those who want useful information. Finally there are those few who read that they may become better, who have the supreme object of mental and spiritual training, who desire to find wisdom and to get understanding. All these motives and many others impel people to read and for each there is provided an abundant supply of material of the particular kind they like.

The problem presented for this topic, however, limits the question. How to read so as to get good, is the end proposed. With that definite object in view, the reader will not forget that he cannot gather grapes from thorns, nor figs from thistles. He cannot get good from a bad book, nor can he get good from a light and frivolous book. There are times when we can get relaxation, which is a distinct good, from a novel or a humorous sketch, but both should be used sparingly, as we use sweets in diet. The mind needs occasional rest, but the mind that is always resting will be poorly furnished. It is easily possible to become so habituated to a kind of reading that it makes no demand on the mental powers, that a book though a serious and useful purpose cannot be read without weariness. But even with good books discrimination must be used. The supply is so enormous, that unless a distinct habit is kept in view a habit of haphazard reading may be formed, which produces only confusion and superficiality. The best results of reading come when some subject is chosen and all reading is directed to the object of attaining a thorough knowledge of that special subject. History, Science, Art, Theology, all present a wide range of such subjects, which may wisely be taken up in turn. Biography, too, in small quantities is healthful, unless the reader has the bad habit of introspection, and is perpetually looking within and expecting in himself the mental and spiritual experiences which belong peculiarly to another. The great object to be aimed at is to get such mental equipment as will fit one for the duties of life.

They Are Crossing.

(Written for "The Christian Herald.")

THEY are crossing o'er the river,
 They are going one by one,
 To the blissful shore of heaven,
 Where they need no glowing sun;
 Where the fields are ever vernal,
 And the skies are ever fair;
 Where the flowers are that blossom
 With immortal fragrance rare;
 They are crossing o'er the river,
 And are meeting over there.

See the aged man and infant
 As they slumber side by side,
 'Neath the flower of the valley,
 With the bridegroom and the bride;

See that long and sad procession,
 Bearing someone to the tomb,
 While around them hang the shadows
 Of the deepest kind of gloom;
 Millions have to heaven journeyed,
 And they say that still there's room.

Soon my time shall come, and laying
 Then aside this robe of clay,
 I shall mount from earthly shadows
 And shall fly to bliss away;
 And my feet shall tread the pavements
 That are garnished with the gold
 Of the city, whose eternal
 Splendors never have been told.
 I shall meet my dear ones yonder,
 Sheltered from the heat and cold.

The Closing Dispensation.

Signs in Government, in Society, and in the Church that the Dispensation is Ending.
 BY REV. H. GRATTAN GUINNESS, D.D. *

OUR interest in the vision of Nebuchadnezzar as interpreted by Daniel (Dan. 2: 32-45) centres in the fourth world-wide empire which was that of Rome which was, as had been predicted, strong as iron breaking and bruising in the earth. It was at its zenith in the first century of the Christian era when Augustus sat on the throne. In his reign Jesus Christ was born at Bethlehem. He was crucified under Tiberius and thus he appeared on earth at a period when Gentile dominion had attained its widest range and loftiest authority, and thus at the central point in the long succession of historic ages.

The Roman Empire was for centuries the civil sphere of the Church's existence. In it, as far as her external life is concerned, she moved and had her being. Nor was the sphere a narrow one. Bounded by the Atlantic Ocean on the west, by the Rhine and Danube on the north, by the Euphrates on the east, and the deserts of Arabia and Africa on the south, the Empire of Rome "comprehended the fairest part of the earth, and the most civilized portion of mankind."

The remains of the temples, palaces, theatres, triumphal arches, aqueducts, and other structures erected during the existence of the Roman Empire abundantly attest the splendor of its history. The numerous and touching inscriptions in the Catacombs testify to the sufferings of the early Christians under Roman persecution. The noble arch of Constantine, built to commemorate the Emperor's victory over Maxentius, is a witness to the overthrow in the fourth century of the persecuting power and dominion of heathen Rome. The magnificent Pantheon, originally devoted to all the divinities of heathenism, has, ever since the beginning of the seventh century, been dedicated to the memory of the martyrs who died for repudiating their worship. Christianity early became (at the close of third century of the Christian Era) the established religion of the Roman Empire.

This same prophet gives us besides these historic facts some chronological numbers that well repay study. About the year A.D. 1750 a remarkable fact in connection with these numbers was discovered by a Swiss astronomer, M. de Chéseaux, a fact which is full of the deepest interest to both Jews and Christians, and which has never received, either at the hands of Bible students or scientists, the attention which it merits. It is this:

The prophetic periods of 1,260 and 2,300 years, assigned in the Book of Daniel and in the Apocalypse as the duration of certain predicted events, are sol-lunar cycles—cycles of remarkable perfection and accuracy, but whose existence was entirely unknown to astronomers until, guided by the sacred Scriptures, M. de Chéseaux discovered and demonstrated them to be such. And further, the difference between these two periods, which is 1,040 years, is the largest accurate sol-lunar cycle known. The cycle is an attempt to obtain absolute accuracy of time measurement. The sol-lunar cycle is the period it requires to bring the earth, the moon, and the sun into precisely the same relative position in the heavens.

A Princess in Calico.

"No, thank you, I will wait out here." The man hobbled into the house and stood waiting, clothed in her sorrow and shame.

"So Lemuel's been an' tuk French ivy," he said, as he handed her the key. "Well, well, I allers did say that 't'd be a heart-break tew ye, Pawliney. Well, what's gone's forgot. Don't fret er him, Pawliney, he was a bad lot, a bad lot. Ye're well rid of him, my dear." "I never shall forget him," Pauline said wearily, "and he can't get away from me, Deacon Croaker."

She counted the bills as she hurried away. It would just make enough, with a butter money. That was all she had for clothes for herself and Polly—but she had enough for awhile, and she would go without.

In the evenings, long after the others were in bed, she paced up and down the room, spinning Deacon Croaker's wool in smooth, even threads, but her heart was as she prayed for her boy, and often, when in the still watches of the night, she kept her vigils with pain, she heard him cry softly, "Lemuel, Lemuel, oh! how could you have let me do it!" Her uncle's family were living abroad now, and it was from Paris that Belle had just announced her engagement to Ronald Gordon.

Just imagine, Paul, the letter went on! Of all possible people, a missionary's wife! But the fact of the matter is, my precious saint, your splendid consecrated life made me tingle with shame to my fingertips when I thought of my aimless existence, and when I remembered how you had taken up your cross and followed your Master to Sleepy Hollow, there seemed to be a reason why I shouldn't follow him to the same. If it will comfort you, I want you to know that you have been the guiding star which has led me out of the mire of my selfishness into active work for the King."

The years slipped by peacefully after this. Her father grew daily more childish, but he needed more constant watching, but she found time to read many a snatch from the favorite authors to Polly, and Tryphena's Bible lay always open near her bed.

At last the day came when in the full of tide her father had called to her in his weak voice.

"It's gettin' dark, Pawliney, and Lemuel's not come home."

"Not yet, father, but he'll come by-and-by. God knows."

"Yes, God knows," said the old man with a peaceful smile. "I think I'll go to bed now, I'm very tired. You've been a good girl, Pawliney, a good girl. God bless you, my dear."

"You ought always to dress in silk, Pauline, instead of calico. I wish you would," and Polly's eyes rested on her with a world of love in their depths.

Pauline laughed, as she kissed her.

"You silly child! Don't you know cottons and silk has to be spun, which makes it costly; and cotton is content to be washed in spring water while silk has to be bathed in tea! Can you spare me for a whole afternoon do you think, if I can't Carlyle and Whittier by your pillow?"

"Where are you going?" "Well, I want to take some apple custard to that poor Dan who fell from the saw, and I must go and see how Susan's children are getting through the winter, then old Mrs. Croaker wants to go to the Widow Larkin wants to read to, and Matilda Jones is 'jesting for a talk." She laughed merrily.

"I never saw anyone get so much into his lives," said Polly wistfully. "I am too."

"A blessed child," cried Pauline with tears in her eyes; "you are our Angel of Peace. Don't ever call yourself useless, you are the centre of gravity to Stephen and me."

When the twilight fell, she sat in her favorite position near the open door, looking out at the rose-tinted clouds, as she and Polly laugh with merry descriptions of their different visits.

Suddenly she grew still, for a sun-browned, bearded man had crossed the threshold and thrown himself at her feet, saying brokenly—

"I've come home to you, Pauline, and I know you'll forgive me, for I've lifted the mortgage, and—I belong to the King."

Before he had finished, her arms were 'round his neck, and Polly heard her cry softly with the break of a great gladness in her voice—

"Lemuel! Why, Lemuel!"

W., Ashland, O., that thanks be given for the remarkable answer that has come to the prayers for help put up recently at his request.—"Sister," Pittsburg, Pa., that thanks be rendered to God for the conversion of a dear friend and her recovery from sickness, whose case was made the subject of prayer at the Bowery Mission a short time ago.

The Sin of the Dance.*

THE dance was not originated for the promotion of health; it was never designed to be, and, in fact, never has been, promotive of health. Viewed as an exercise, as at present conducted, it is in violation of the soundest hygienic laws. The exercise of dancing, under limiting condition of time, place, scope, and participants, might be eminently healthful. Such it might be as an element of the gymnasium curriculum. But the dance of to-day is not conducted for the purpose of promoting health and longevity. Viewed as an exercise, leaving out of account moral considerations, the dance, as an institution of society, violates the laws of health. **

The modern dance exerts a positive influence in withstanding the Spirit of God calling the human soul to a Christian life. This indictment is sustained by the testimony of living witnesses who declare that the seductive influence of the dance was for years the very stronghold of their resistance to the Spirit of God. All persons who have had a larger or smaller experience in evangelistic work of any sort have had frequent evidences of the truth of this indictment supplied to them. A number of cases have fallen under our own observation in which the thought that the Christian life involved the surrender of the dance as an amusement restrained many from entering upon it. There are persons in every Christian community or congregation to whom the question of their entrance upon the religious life or the service of God has been definitely negated or indefinitely postponed by a determination to seek the life of pleasure, in which they believe the dance is a leading attraction.

The Presbyterian Church has again and again, in its General Assembly, uttered its solemn admonition against the dance as an amusement inimical to the Christian conscience. Some years ago the General Assembly put itself on record in the following resolutions, which we have no knowledge of having been repudiated:

"That whilst the pleasure of the ball-room and the theatre are primarily intended by the 'dancing and stage plays' forbidden in the answer to the 139th question in the Larger Catechism, the spirit of the prohibition extends to all kindred amusements which are calculated to awaken thoughts and feelings inconsistent with the Seventh Commandment as explained by the Saviour in Matthew 5: 27, 28. That whilst we regard the practice of promiscuous social dancing by members of the church as a mournful inconsistency, and the giving of parties for such dancing on the part of heads of families as tending to compromise their religious profession, and the sending of children of Christian parents to the dancing-school as a sad error in family discipline, yet we think that the session of each church is fully competent to decide when discipline is necessary, and the extent to which it should be administered."

The Methodist Episcopal Church, North and South, has embodied in its "General Rules," which every person received into the fellowship of the great communion expresses "willingness to observe and keep," that all persons who desire to continue in the fellowship of this church shall abstain from "all such diversions as cannot be used in the name of the Lord Jesus." This rule has always been interpreted as prohibiting members from attending theatres, circuses, balls, dancing parties, etc. Members of the Methodist Episcopal Church who dance, or even attend dancing parties, not only violate one of the fundamental rules of their church, but they are also guilty of violating a solemn pledge, given on admission to membership, to "observe and keep the rules" of the church.

Many able and distinguished bishops of the Episcopal Church, earlier and later, have pronounced upon the dance in unmistakable language. No severer restrictions can be met with anywhere within the Christian Church than is found in deliverance from prominent ecclesiastics within this communion. Bishop Hopkins, of Vermont once said: "In the period of youthful education, I have shown that dancing is chargeable with waste of time, the interruption to useful study, the indulgence of personal vanity and display, and the premature incitement of the passions. At the age of maturity, it adds to these no small danger to health, by late hours flimsy dresses, heated rooms, and exposed persons; while its incongruity with strict Christian sobriety and principle, and its tendency to the love of dissipation are so manifest, that no ingenuity can make it consistent with the covenant of baptism." Bishop Meade, of Virginia, speaking of the evil tendencies and accompaniments of the dance as an amusement, said, "We ought conscientiously to inquire whether its great liability to abuse, and its many acknowledged abuses, should not make us frown upon it in all its forms." He expresses his opinion further, that "social dancing is not among the neutral things which, within certain limits, we may do at pleasure, and even that is not among the things lawful, but not expedient, but that it is, in itself, wrong, improper, and of bad effect." Bishop McIlvaine, of Ohio, once declared of the theatre and the dance, "The only line I would draw in regard to these is, that of entire exclusion." He held that "they are renounced in baptism, that their renunciation is ratified in confirmation, and professed in every participation of the Lord's Supper."

The Presbyterian Board publishes the following: "The dancing school, instead of being called a school of easy manners, ought rather to be styled a place where girls are taught to substitute the finesse of the coquette for true feminine delicacy, and where boys take their primary lessons in the arts of seduction." An ex-dancing master, Mr. T. A. Faulkner, once proprietor of the Los Angeles Dancing Academy, and ex-president of the Dancing Masters' Association of the Pacific Coast, gives it as his deliberate conviction that "two-thirds of the girls who are ruined fall through the influence of dancing." The matron of a home for fallen women in Los Angeles declares that "seven-tenths of the girls received here have fallen through dancing and its influence." Of the 2500 abandoned women of San Francisco, Professor La Floris testifies: "I can safely say that three-fourths of these women were led to their downfall through the influence of dancing." And, crossing to the other side of the continent, the chief of police of the City of New York is authority for the statement that "three-fourths of abandoned girls of New York were ruined by dancing."

In view of these facts and observations, that the Christian pulpit has something more than prejudice and fanaticism for the ground of its opposition to the modern dance. We believe, that here is a vice upon which "no minister of Christ must utter an uncertain sound."

MASSACRE AT VAN.

ancient Armenian City may Share the Fate of Oorfa and Erzeroum.

Y a cable dispatch from Constantinople it is learned that advices have been received there from Van in Armenia, giving the news of an outbreak in that city during which many Armenians were killed by the Turks, one account placing the number at 1500. A number of others claim that the massacre was the result of but also to perpetuate the worship of the one who founded the trade or craft. Barbers, for instance, remember year by year the one who introduced shaving; and carpenters remember the first carpenter; and they build temples, and periodically hold theatricals, and expend large sums of money in maintaining the worship. When a man becomes a Christian he has to cut himself adrift from these things.

A Strange Arab Ceremonial.

One of the artist-correspondents now in the field with the Anglo-Egyptian troops operating against the dervishes in the Nile valley, was the spectator of a very remarkable scene at a town called Monkallo. A number of Arab women, whose husbands had been killed in battle, engaged in a religious dance in honor of their memory. This strange dance (which is shown in the picture on this page) is intended as an expression of fidelity to the dead spouses and also of a desire for rate attempt on the part of the representatives of the Porte to destroy the part of the male Christian population of Van, as they did that of Oorfa, Malatia, Arabkir and other cities later. Heretofore, Van has fortunately escaped the horrors of massacre owing to the fact that the Armenians greatly outnumbered the Turks and were well armed, and also because the Vali or governor, though a Turk, is an official and would not consent to schemes for killing and robbing the Armenians.

The readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD had a special interest in the welfare of the American missionaries at Van, and a considerable portion of the relief fund among the Armenian sufferers in that province, an effort was made to ascertain the true situation. The proprietor of the Journal cabled to Dr. Grace Kimball a simple message of inquiry, to know whether there had been a massacre of the missionaries were safe. This was seized at Constantinople by the Turkish authorities who refused to let the news go through to Van, on the pretext that it was calculated to disturb the Sultan's dominion. This is in accordance with Turkey's usual policy of shutting off all means of communication between the provinces or districts in which attacks on Christians have been made. It strengthens the impression that Van is in desperate straits and that even the missionaries are in peril.

When the news of a massacre be connected may mean the beginning of a cycle of horrors, since it is hardly probable that the fanatical Moslems will permit some attempt is made, on a still larger scale, to destroy the Armenians of Van.

Reports from the American Board missionaries at Aintab and Sivas report considerable progress in relief work. There is a terrible distress in the Harpoot

Dr. J. H. Fuller, of the American College at Aintab, writes that the missionaries from the whole, hopeful for the future from Sivas Mrs. H. T. Perry writes that the money sent from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Relief Fund to Sivas is being used for the relief of Gurun, where there is great suffering.

Business Gods in China.

In connection with every trade and business in China there is what is known as a guild, and this guild has been created, not merely to bind the members together, vengeance upon their slayers. To the ordinary observer it seems, however, an absurd and meaningless exercise, and is more of the nature of a heathen orgy, borrowed by the Arabs through contact with the blacks, than of a serious ceremonial that has come down through generations more or less enlightened, to the present day.

Eager to be Missionaries.

At a recent meeting, Miss Hanbury, a missionary in China, related this pleasant experience: After being at the Home a year and nine months, I went to take charge of the work in Chefoo. Our schools in Chefoo are for the children of our missionaries and the children of missionaries of other societies, and for the children of Chinese merchants. This year we have 107 children in one school, and we could have more if our premises were larger. A larger place is now being erected. This is a very real work. We have an opportunity of training, as we trust, missionaries for the future. Last year the question was put in a little prayer-meeting in the girls' school, "Are any of you thinking of being missionaries?" and nine girls put up their hands. It was a settled idea in their minds that when they were old enough they would be missionaries.

Death-bed Confidence.

It is related that Faraday, the distinguished scientist, was asked on his dying bed: "What are your speculations?" "Speculations? I have none. I am resting on certainties. I know whom I have believed-and am persuaded that he is able to keep that which I have committed to him."

Calvary's Story.

I HAVE heard such a beautiful story, The sweetest I ever have known; It brought me such rest when my heart was distressed, I made that old story my own.

CHORUS: Wonderful story! O wonderful story! 'Tis greater than mortal hath dreamed, O marvelous story of darkness and glory That makes a lost sinner redeemed.

When I tell that sweet story to others, It brings them a blessing like mine, And hearts that were sad are made peaceful and glad With Calvary's healing divine.

Are you telling that same blessed story Wherever the sorrowful are? A light they shall know that will banish their woe And guide them to glory afar.

HAIR ON THE FACE, NECK, ARMS OR ANY PART OF THE PERSON QUICKLY DISSOLVED AND REMOVED WITH THE NEW SOLUTION

MODENE

AND THE GROWTH FOREVER DESTROYED WITHOUT THE SLIGHTEST INJURY OR DISCOLORATION OF THE MOST DELICATE SKIN.

Discovered by Accident.—In Correspondence, an incomplete mixture was accidentally spilled on the back of the hand, and on washing afterward it was discovered that the hair was completely removed. We purchased the new discovery and named it MODENE. It is perfectly pure, free from all injurious substances, and so simple any one can use it. It acts mildly but surely, and you will be surprised and delighted with the results. Apply for a few minutes and the hair disappears as if by magic. It has no resemblance whatever to any other preparation ever used for a like purpose, and no scientific discovery ever attained such wonderful results. IT CAN NOT FAIL. If the growth be light, one application will remove it permanently; the heavy growth such as the beard or hair on the mole may require two or more applications before all the roots are destroyed, although all hair will be removed at each application, and without slightest injury or unpleasant feeling when applied or ever afterward. MODENE SUPERSEDES ELECTROLYSIS.

Recommended by all who have tested its merits.—Used by people of refinement.

Gentlemen who do not appreciate nature's gift of a beard, will find a priceless boon in Modene, which does away with shaving. It dissolves and destroys the life principle of the hair, thereby rendering its future growth an utter impossibility, and is guaranteed to be as harmless as water to the skin. Young persons who find an embarrassing growth of hair coming, should use Modene to destroy its growth. Modene sent by mail in safety mailing cases, postage paid, (securely sealed from observation) on receipt of price, $1.00 per bottle. Send money by letter, with your full address written plainly. Correspondence strictly private. Postage stamps received the same as cash. (ALWAYS MENTION YOUR COUNTY AND THIS PAPER.) Cut this advertisement out.

VOLUME 19.

LEWIS WITT TALMAGE, D. D., Editor.
Bible House, New York City.

NEW YORK, JULY 15, 1896.

NUMBER 29.

Price Five Cents.

IF the casual visitor who happens to stroll through any of the densely populated sections of the great East-side of New York, these broiling July days, —when courts and alleys are as hot as fires, and even gaunt poverty is forced to come outdoors to avoid suffocation — and look at the children he meets in these places, he would be melted with pity for their condition. Pale and thin, even through the side of the gutter, they break and bleed for lack of pure air and wholesome nourishment. They either sit listlessly and play under the dilapidated awnings in the shade of a wall, or they seem to have gone out of their poor little bodies — we see them, who are denied the joys and pleasures that usually fall to the lot of childhood. It is in such neighborhoods that the CHRISTIAN HERALD Children's Home finds its field of work. Our illustration tells the story of one missionary's visit, a few days ago, to a Hester street tenement court, where she was eagerly welcomed by the barefooted toddler, who hung round her and begged to be taken to Mont-Lawn, the fair where her mother's friends had been through the neighborhood. Nor were there more pleasant than the old folks who showed their appreciation by warmly welcoming her. "Oh, mum, it'll do you a world of good. I used to live in the country myself, when I was a girl and I love it!" And she glanced lovingly around her at the impenetrable, crossing rows of wooden fences, fire-escapes, and clothes' lines, shutting out all of nature, save a bit of blue sky above.

LITTLE BAREFOOTS FROM THE SLUMS.

Nearly 700 of Them Have Already Been Housed at Mont-Lawn this Season and Hundreds more are Anxiously Waiting to Come—Clothing Greatly Needed.

Nearly 700 little guests have been received and sheltered at our Children's Home thus far, since the beginning of the present season. They include all ages, from the wee toddler of five to the child of ten or twelve. Very many, who come from the poorest localities, reach the Home shoeless and some with garments that are little better than an apology for clothes. Those of our readers who desire to help us clothe these little ones decently, can render valuable aid, by sending us such surplus garments for children as are not needed in their own homes; hats, coats, shoes and stockings for boys of from five to ten years, and waists, skirts, shoes and underwear for girls from five to twelve being badly needed. The garments should be whole and clean, packed in boxes and sent by express, prepaid, to Miss Collins, the Matron at Mont-Lawn, Nyack, N. Y. All such kind gifts will be welcomed and duly acknowledged. We believe there are among the thousands of mothers and sisters who read THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, many who will gladly aid in such a work.

Some of the letters sent home by those who are old enough to write and have received sufficient education, are very amusing. One wee maiden — Julia by name — though twelve years of age, had never been to the country before. She wrote:

Dear father and sister, Arthur and I is all wright. Arthur is living with me, and we like it very much. Arthur has lots of fun, but he can't see Gertie, and that makes him feel bad sometimes. We like the food and we don't have to do a bit of work. We run in the grass all day and pick flowers and swing. We have a bath to go in the day for boys and one day for girls. We will be home Monday.

A bright little lad writes:

Dear mamma — I am having a fine time. Its nice eating up here and its a little better. There is loads of flowers and trees, and scups and horses. The teachers are nice and Dr. Klopsch.

This one, from a tiny lass of seven, is interesting:

Dear mother, We are getting along very nice. We do not feel home-sick at all. Hester's nose was sore and the teacher took her to the doctor in the Home. We are all well and happy. I am glad you are the same.

Some children never before in the country, call the lawn mower a "grass scraper," and a man they saw mowing with a scythe, "the man cutting grass with the funny knife." They found some acorn cups in the woods and thought they were "birds nests." They were much frightened one evening by a calf

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

KINDNESS FOR ANOTHER'S SAKE.

Sermon Preached by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., at Washington, D. C., on the Text: II. Sam. 9: 1, 13, Is there yet any that is left of the house of Saul, that I may shew him kindness for Jonathan's sake? . . . So Mephibosheth dwelt in Jerusalem: for he did eat continually at the king's table; and was lame on both his feet.

WAS there ever anything more romantic and chivalrous than the love of David and Jonathan? At one time Jonathan was up and David was down. Now David is up and Jonathan's family is down. As you have often heard of two soldiers before going into battle making a covenant that if one is shot the survivor will take charge of the body, the watch, the mementoes, and perhaps of the bereft family of the one that dies, so David and Jonathan had made a covenant, and now that Jonathan was dead, David is inquiring about his family, that he may show kindness unto them for their father Jonathan's sake. Careful search is made, and a son of Jonathan by the dreadfully homely name of Mephibosheth is found. His nurse, in his infancy, had let him fall, and the fall had put both his ankles out of place, and they had never been set. This decrepit, poor man is brought into the palace of King David. David looks upon him with melting tenderness, no doubt seeing in his face a resemblance to his old friend, the deceased Jonathan. The whole bearing of King David toward him seems to say: "How glad I am to see you, Mephibosheth. How you remind me of your father, my old friend and benefactor. I made a bargain with your father a good many years ago, and I am going to keep it with you. What can I do for you, Mephibosheth? I am resolved what to do: I will make you a rich man; I will restore to you the confiscated property of your grandfather Saul, and you shall be a guest of mine as long as you live, and you shall be seated at my table among the princes." It was too much for Mephibosheth, and he cried out against it, calling himself a dead dog. "Be still," says David, "I don't do this on my own account; I do this for your father Jonathan's sake. I can never forget his kindness. I remember when I was wounded from place to place how he befriended me. Can I ever forget how he stripped himself of his courtier apparel and gave it to me instead of my shepherd's bat, and how he took off his own sword and belt and gave them to me instead of my sling? Oh, I can never forget him. I feel as if I couldn't do enough for you, his son. I don't do it for your sake; I do it for your father Jonathan's sake." "So Mephibosheth dwelt in Jerusalem: for he did eat continually at the king's table; and was lame on both his feet."

There is so much Gospel in this quaint story that I am sure you will find here to begin. Whom do Mephibosheth, and David, and Jonathan make you think of? Mephibosheth, the text says, "was lame on both his feet." I don't know of any other lame man in the Bible. He is a gallant, as a Don Juan; George and describes sin as triumphant in many of the psalms. Jonathan, the son of David's knife, always shows sin as a great peculiarity; but the Bible presents it as a Mephibosheth, lame on both feet. Sin, carry us, and let us fall, and we have been disabled, and in our whole moral nature we are decrepit. Sometimes theologians haggle about a technicality. They use the words "total depravity," and some people believe in the doctrine, and some reject it. What do you mean by total depravity? Do you mean that every man is as bad as he can be? Then I do not believe it either. But do you mean that sin has let us fall, that it has scarified, and disabled, and crippled our entire moral nature, until we cannot walk straight, and are lame in both feet? Then I admit your proposition. There is not so much difference in an African jungle, with barking, howling, hissing, fighting quadruped and reptile, and Paradise with its animals coming before Adam when he patted them and stroked them and gave them names, so that the panther was as tame as the cow, and the condor as tame as the dove, as there is between the human soul disabled and that soul as God originally constructed it. I do not care what the sentimentalists or the poets say in regard to sin; in the name of God I declare to you to-day that sin is disorganization, disintegration, ghastly disfiguration, hobbling deformity.

Your modern theologian tells you that man is a little out of sorts; he sometimes thinks wrong; he sometimes does wrong; indeed, his nature needs a little moral surgery, an outside splint, a slight compress, a little rectification. Religion is a good thing to have; it might some day come into use. Man is partially wrong, not all wrong. He is lame in one foot. Bring the salve of divine grace and the ointment, and the pain extractor, and we will have his one foot cured. Man is only half wrong, not altogether wrong. In what is man's nature right? In his will? his affections? his judgment? No. There is an old book that says: "The whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint." Mephibosheth lame in both feet. Our belief of the fact that sin has scarified and deformed our souls increases as we go on in years. When you started life you thought that man was a little marred by sin, and he was about one-tenth wrong. By the time you had gone through the early experience of your trade, or occupation, or profession, you believed that man was about half wrong. By the time you came to mid-life you believed that man was three-fourths wrong. But within these past few years, since you have been soiled about and swindled in the world, you have come to the conclusion that man is altogether wrong, and now you are in line with the prophets and with the Bible: "There is no health in us." Now you agree with the prophet, "The heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked." Whatever you may have believed before, now you believe that Mephibosheth is lame on both feet.

Again, Mephibosheth in the text stands for the disabled human soul humbled and restored. When this invalid of my text the grandfather of Mephibosheth had treated David most shockingly, and now Mephibosheth says to himself, "What does the king want of me? Isn't it enough that I am lame? Is he going to destroy my life? Is he going to wreak on me the vengeance which he holds toward my grandfather Saul? It's too bad." But go to the palace Mephibosheth must, since the king has commanded it. With staff and crutches and helped by his friends, I see Mephibosheth going up the stairs of the palace. I hear his staff and crutches rattling on the tessellated floor of the throne-room.

No sooner have these two persons confronted each other—Mephibosheth and David, the king—than Mephibosheth throws himself flat on his face before the king, and styles himself a dead dog. In the East, when a man styles himself a dog, he utters the utmost term of self-abnegation. It is not a term so strong in this country, where, if a dog has a fair chance, he sometimes shows more nobility of character than some human specimens that we wot of; but the mangy curs of the Oriental cities, as I know by my own observation, are utterly detestable. Mephibosheth gives the utmost term of self-loathing when he compares himself to a dog, and dead at that.

Consider the analogy. When the command is given from the palace of heaven to the human soul to come, the soul begins to tremble. It says: "What is God going to do with me now? Is he going to destroy me? Is he going to wreak his vengeance upon me?" There is more than one Mephibosheth trembling now, because God has summoned him to the palace of divine grace! What are you trembling about? God has no pleasure in the death of a sinner. He does not send for you to hurt you. He sends for you to do you good. A Scotch preacher had the following circumstances brought under his observation: There was a poor woman in the parish who was about to be turned out because she could not pay her rent. One night she heard a loud knocking at the door, and she made no answer, and hid herself. The rapping continued louder, louder, louder, but she made no answer, and continued to hide herself. She was almost frightened unto death. She said: "That's the officer of the law come to throw me out of my home."

A few days after a Christian philanthropist met her in the street, and said: "My poor woman, where were you the other night? I came round to your house to pay your rent. Why didn't you let me in? Were you at home?" "Why," she replied, "was that you?" "Yes, that was me; I came to pay your rent." "Why," she said, "if I had had any idea it was you I would have let you in. I thought it was an officer come to cast me out of my home." O soul, that loud knocking at thy gate to-day is not the sheriff come to put you in jail; it is the best friend you ever had come to be your security. You shiver with terror because you think it is wrath. It is mercy. Why, then, tremble before the King of heaven and earth calls you to his palace? Stop trembling and start right away. "Oh," you say, "I can't start. I have been so lamed by sin, and so lamed by evil habit, I can't start. I am lame in both feet." My friend, we come out with our prayers and sympathies to help you up to the palace. If you want to get to the palace you may get there. Start now. The Holy Spirit will help you. All you have to do is just to throw yourself on your face at the feet of the King, as Mephibosheth did.

And again: Mephibosheth in my text stands for the disabled human soul saved for the sake of another. Mephibosheth would never have got into the palace on his own account. Why did David ransack the realm to find that poor man, and then bestow upon him a great fortune, and command a farmer by the name of Ziba to culture the estate and proceeds every year? Why did King David make such a mighty stir about a poor fellow who would never be of any use to the throne of Israel? It was for Jonathan's sake. It was what Robert Burns calls for "auld lang syne." David could not forget what Jonathan had done for him in other days. Three times this chapter has it that all this kindness on the part of David to Mephibosheth was for his father Jonathan's sake. The daughter of Peter Martyr, through the vice of her husband, came down to penury, and the Senate of Zurich took care of her for her father's sake. Sometimes kindness has applied to you for help, and you have refused him; but when you find he was the son or brother of some one who had been your benefactor in some way, and by a glance you saw the resemblance, your old friend in the face of the applicant, you relented, and you said: "Oh, I will do this for your father's sake." You know by your experience what my text means. Now, my friends, it is on that principle that you and I are to get into the King's palace.

The most important part of every prayer is the last three or four words of it—"For Christ's sake." Do not rattle off those words as though they were merely the finishing stroke of the prayer. They are the most important part of the prayer. When in earnestness you go before God and say, "For Christ's sake," it rolls in, as it were, upon God's mind all the memories of Bethlehem and Gennesareth and Golgotha. When you say before God, "For Christ's sake," you hold before God's mind every groan, every tear, every crimson drop of his only begotten Son. If there is anything in all the world that will move God to an act of beneficence, it is to say, "For Christ's sake." God is omnipotent, but he is strong enough to resist the temptation of "Christ's sake." If a little child should kneel behind God's throne and should say, "For Christ's sake," the great Jehovah would turn around on his throne to look at her and listen. No prayer ever gets to heaven but for Christ's sake. No soul is ever comforted but for Christ's sake. The world will never be redeemed but for Christ's sake. Our name, however illustrious it may be among men, before God stands only for inconsistency and sin; but there is a name, a potent name, a blessed name, a glorious name, an everlasting name, that we may put upon our lips as a sacrament and upon our forehead as a crown, and that is the name of Jesus, our divine Jonathan, who stripped himself of his robe and put on our rags, and gave us his sword and took our broken reed, so that now, whether we are well or sick, whether we are living or dying, if we speak that name it moves heaven to the centre, and God says: "Let the poor soul come in. Carry him up into the throne-room of the palace. Though he may have been in exile, though sin may have crippled him on this side, and sorrow may have crippled him on the other side, and he is lame in both his feet, bring him up into the palace, for I want to show him everlasting kindness for Jonathan's sake."

Again: Mephibosheth in my text stands for the disabled human soul lifted to the King's table. It was more difficult in those times even than it is now for common men to get into a royal dinner party. The subjects might have used an iron rail of the palace and might have seen the lights kindled, and might have heard the clash of the knives and the rattling of the golden goblets, but not get in. Still, men with stout feet could not get in. In all their lives to one banquet, yet poor Mephibosheth goes in, lives there, and is every day at the table. Oh, what a getting up in the world it was for poor Mephibosheth! Well, though you and I may be wofully lamed with sin, for our divine Jonathan's sake, I hope we will all get in to dine with the King.

If you are invited to a company of persons where there are distinguished people present, you are introduced: "This is Senator." "This is the Governor." "This is the President." Before we sit down at the King's table in heaven I think we will want to be introduced. At what a time that will be, when you are, by the grace of God, get into heaven, and are introduced to the mighty spirits there, and some one will say: "This is Joshua." "This is Paul." "This is Moses." "This is John Knox." "This is John Milton." "This is Martin Luther." "This is George Whitefield." Shall we have any strength left after a round of celestial introduction?

We shall be potentates ourselves. We shall sit down at the King's table with the sons and daughters of God, and he will whisper across the table to us and say, "Behold what manner of love the Father hath bestowed upon us that we should be called the sons of God!" Some one at the table will say, "How long will it last? All other banquets at which I sat ended. How long will this last?" and Paul will answer "Forever!" Joshua will say "Forever!" and John Knox will say "Forever!" and George Whitefield will say "Forever!"

And the wine at that banquet will be the wine; it will be very old wine; it will be the oldest wine of heaven; it will be the wine that was trodden out from the clusters on the day when Jesus trod the winepress alone. Wine already more than eighteen centuries old. And no one will deride us as to what we were in this world. No one will bring up our imperfections here, our sins here. All our imperfections completely covered and hidden. Mephibosheth's feet were on the table. Kingly fare. Kingly companionship. We shall be forever and ever. I think that banquet will mean more to those who had it in this world than to those who had it not. That banquet in David's palace meant more to Mephibosheth than to any other, because he had been poor and despised, and despised, and rejected. And no man who in this world is blind will ever appreciate the light of heaven than the man who in this world had good eyesight. That man who in this world was deaf will better appreciate the music of heaven than we who in this world had good hearing. And those will have a higher appreciation of the easy locomotion of the land who in this world were Mephibosheths.

O my soul, what a magnificent gospel! It makes a man so low down and raises him so high! What a gospel! Come, you, who wants to be banqueted and embraced? As when Wilberforce way tried to get the "Emancipation Bill" through the British Parliament, and all the British Isles were anxious to hear of the passage of that "Emancipation Bill," when a vessel was coming into port and the captain of the vessel knew that the vessel was so anxious to get the tidings, he stepped out on the prow of the ship and shouted to the people, long before he came up to the dock, "Free!" and they shouted it, and they shouted it, and they shouted it all through the land, "Free! Free!" So to-day I would like to sound news of your present and your eternal emancipation until the angels of God were ringing in the air, and watchmen on the elements, and bell-men in the town cry about it, sing it, ring it: "Free! free!" I am out now as the messenger of the peace to invite Mephibosheth to come up here to-day to tell you that God has a wealth of kindness to bestow upon you for His Son's sake. The doors of the grace are open to receive you. The cup-bearers have already put the chalices on the table, and the great, loving, tender, sympathetic heart of God bends over you at this moment, saying: "Is there any yet left of the house of Saul, that I may show him kindness for Jonathan's sake?"

The Gospel in Zululand.

Missionary John L. Dube, a Native Convert, Tells of the Work Among His People—A Promising Field.

HERE are now in this country for purposes of study and preparation for effective Gospel work in Natal, Rev. John L. Dube and his wife, two native Zulus, who for several years past have conducted an excellent Christian work at Mapumelo Mission Station, in the Colony of Natal, South Africa. At the request of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Mr. Dube has written the following brief account of his field of labor:

"In writing these lines, I have to testify to the power of God, who alone is capable of lifting the veil of heathenism among our people. He it is who is alone able to make the civilized nations who enter Africa have a better desire than that of gain by war and rapine. My grandfather was a powerful Zulu chief, so influential that he excited the jealousy of Chaka, the 'Lion of the Zulu nation.' My grandfather was different from Chaka. He was kind to his subjects; so a large number of people, even some of Chaka's people, flocked to his support. Had he desired, he would have made things unpleasant for Chaka.

"Chaka made great pretensions that he was a friend of my grandfather. He called his advisers and said to them: 'I am afraid Dube is getting more powerful every day, and if we do not put down his power, he will some day fall upon us and kill us, and thus become the head of the Zulu nation. Let us send word to him that there is a fence to be built and that he should send his men to help.' This was done, and my grandfather, suspecting no treachery, sent a large number of his young men unarmed. When they reached Chaka's kraal, they were sent in the bush where the poles were to be obtained. He had already placed his warriors in ambush. They fell upon Dube's people and killed them, and went to Dube's kraal and killed him also.

"It was at this time that my grandmother with my father—then a little boy—escaped with the rest of the tribe and found refuge in Natal. It was at this time when the late missionary, Mr. Findley (Umqilikaqi, as the Zulus call him), began his labors among the Zulus there. My grandmother accepted the Christian faith, and my father was reared in Mr. Findley's family and grew up as a Christian. His heathen friends wanted him to come and exercise the power of a chief among them, but stipulated that he had better renounce his new religion, to which he said he would not for all Africa. Having received suitable instruction in the Word of God, he was ordained pastor of the Inanda Church, where he saw many of his tribe brought to the knowledge of God. After years of successful work, he died.

"I came to this country in 1887 to prepare myself for missionary work among my people. Mr. Wilcox sent me to Oberlin where I pursued my studies, but my health failed, and I was obliged to return home before my plans were realized. Shortly after my return, my health improved and I was immediately engaged in Christian work in connection with the missionaries of the American Board. But having the conviction that I was called to preach the Gospel among those who have not had the advantages of Christian teaching, I told my friends that I wished to go to Incwadi and preach the Gospel there. The missionaries told me of the straitened condition of the Board. I knew God had infinite resources, and that he had bidden us to go forward. I and my wife started for our new field. We had to live in a hut for several months, before I built our house. We met with many difficulties but our God has wonderfully blessed our little faith. We have had a church built 50 x 20 feet. Mrs. Winslow of Henrietta interested some of her friends in the work and thus to-day the good tidings of peace are being proclaimed at Incwadi. There are thirty members connected with the church. We have a day-school with more than sixty children, and three out-preaching places. In carrying on this work I have not received any salary but have depended on God that if it is his work he will carry it on. We had many difficulties among our people in preaching the Gospel to them. You are perhaps aware that it is customary with the Zulus to give ten head of cattle for their wives. Parents look upon their daughter just as one would look upon something he shall sell. Hence we had a great difficulty in getting them to allow us to teach their children. They feared that they would not get anything for them. As for themselves they say, 'Oh, we are too old, and what are we going to do with all these wives? You missionaries require us to give them up and become Christians.' This is one of the difficulties of mission work among the Zulus. They can get as many wives as they are able to buy. If one of their wives is con-

the ways of civilized people, and be a help in the work of lifting up Zulu women. If Africa is to be evangelized, I believe it has largely to be done by her own sons and daughters."

Mr. Dube and his wife, while pursuing their studies here with a view to resuming their work in the South African field, are dependent for support upon the voluntary aid that may be rendered by Christian people who have the cause of Africa's evangelization at heart. Any letters may be addressed to them in the care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

The Knife-Grinder's Bible.

M. Nardi, a Bible colporteur in New Orleans relates this incident: In New Orleans, about six years ago, a young Italian (converted somewhere else) was going through the streets of that city with a grinding machine, on top of which he used always to carry the Bible. Passing by an Italian well-to-do barber, he spoke to him about reading that book. The barber refused no less than ten times, but the grinder never passed by without making the same request. One day, tired of being annoyed, the barber said: "Leave it here, but to-morrow be sure to come back to take it." The grinder did not go back for a week, so giving time to read it; and, lo! when one evening he went back, the barber had opened a mission in his own store and was preaching from that book to a number of Italians. The barber's name is Signor Russo, now an ordained Presbyterian minister with a large congregation. Then an ex-priest who had heard of it went there to oppose him, and to fight him, and to get away those who went there, but he, too, took the Bible to look into it; and, lo! a month after that he had opened another mission and was ordained by the Methodists. He has built a brick church in New Orleans, and now he is preaching in Cincinnati—a member of the Methodist Conference in Ohio. Hundreds have been brought to Christ by these two men.

Unseen Protection.

Nature furnishes us with many similitudes of the Divine. It is related that a lady was awakened one morning by a strange noise of pecking at her window, and when she got up she saw a butterfly flying backwards and forwards inside the window in a great fright, because outside there was a sparrow pecking at the glass, wanting to reach the butterfly. The butterfly did not see the glass, but it saw the sparrow, and evidently expected every moment to be caught. Neither did the sparrow see the glass, though it saw the butterfly, and made sure of catching it. But all the while the butterfly, because of that thin, invisible sheet of glass, was actually as safe as if it had been miles away from the sparrow. It is when we forget our Protector that our hearts fail us. Elisha's servant was in great fear when he awoke in the morning and saw the city of Dothan encompassed with horses and chariots and a great host; but when his eyes were opened his fears vanished. The unseen protection is ever present with the Christian.

What Small Things Accomplish.

Rev. Mr. Pentecost, speaking at a recent Gospel meeting, said he remembered visiting the Gatling gun factory in the United States, and there he saw a great bar of steel, weighing five or six hundred pounds, and eight feet in length, suspended by a very delicate chain. Some distance off there was also suspended a common bottle cork by a silk thread. He asked the superintendent what the experiment was, and the latter answered that they were trying the effect of the superimposition of motion. The experiment was intended to show whether the cork could set the steel bar in motion. He did not believe it possible. The superintendent swung the cork gently against the steel bar. There was no result. But he did it again and again, and so on for ten minutes, till at the end of that time he could see that the bar of steel was beginning to feel uncomfortable. It had a kind of a nervous chill, and in half-an-hour that great bar was swinging to the utmost of its tether. Christians have a superhuman work before them in trying to evangelize society, but beyond and behind them all is the power of God, and if they keep on striking, in the end it will yield to the impact.

REV. JOHN L. DUBE AND WIFE.

verted, it is hard to know just what best to do. Shall she be received into the church? She is as much a polygamist as her husband, so long as she is his wife.

"Our people have customs which show that they came from the North, and that they once were in contact with the Jewish nation. They observe the 'Feast of the First-Fruits.' When the crop is ripe, no one is allowed to take even an ear of corn, until the king has eaten usulica (a small kind of pumpkin). Then a great feast is prepared, when all the warriors go to the king's headquarters accompanied by the girls. A number of cattle are killed for the feast, which is followed by a dance, after which the girls take the first-fruits and throw them into the water as their offering, and that there may be plenty of rain and an abundant harvest.

"One of the customs similar to those of the Jews is Ukugena (taking the deceased brother's wife). Women are generally divided among the brothers, after an ox had been killed to 'bring home the deceased,' as the Zulus say; for be it known that our people all believe in the hereafter. They believe that if a person dies, his spirit is in the form of a snake. Before an ox has been killed, to bring him home (that is to have his spirit in sympathy with the spirits of the living), his wives will not be taken. However, after this ceremony has been observed, the wives can choose among the brothers. They say, as any one conversing with them will find out: 'We are mortal; there is a gulf which separates us from the world of Amatonga,' (signifying a spirit); 'there are good and evil spirits, the good watching over us; the evil ready to do us harm. These good spirits are allowed to assume the form of a snake, and by that means, not only form a link between us and the world of spirit, but in the guise of a snake they are permitted thus to watch over us.'

"I have felt that in order to lead my people in the ways of truth, I need more instruction in the word of God. I brought my wife, that she may come in touch with God's Promises to David.

Sunday School Lesson for July 26. II. Sam. 7: 1-16. Golden Text, Psalm 71: 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

DAVID was a man after God's own heart; he did not pay occasional visits to his God just when he was in sore need, and could get help no other way. Just as with all who live habitually in the presence of God, "the secret place of the Most High" (Ps. 91: 1), his thoughts turned to God, when he was in repose, as the magnet to the pole. When he dwelt in his house, "and the Lord had given him rest from all his enemies round about him," he did not count his prosperity as a reason why he should slacken his Intercommunion with God.

There are men of whom it may be said: "Lord, in trouble have they visited thee; they poured out a prayer when thy chastening was upon them," (Isa. 26: 16), but the bent of their mind is not towards God. With them to seek unto the Lord is the exception; it was with David, and it is with true men of faith, the rule. The very comfort and beauty of his house, instead of filling him with admiration for his own taste, or conceit in his own prosperity, was in his heart, a reason for thinking all the more of the God at whose hands he received every good gift.

The thoughts of David's heart, surrendered as he was to his God, turned towards the ark of God which he had been privileged to bring up, and place in the tabernacle which he had pitched for it in the city of David. But the altar of sacrifice and the golden altar of incense were in the tabernacle at Gibeon, no longer in Shiloh as in Samuel's time. (Ps. 78: 60, 61, 67: II. Chron. 16: 1, 37-40). But, David thought, and he said it to his friend Nathan the prophet: "I dwell in a house of cedar, but the ark of God dwelleth within curtains." It was almost insupportable to this man of God, that in external things he, the king, should be more honored than God. Let God be first, was in his heart. Nathan understood him, the two men were agreed in honoring their God, and he said to the king, "Go, do all that is in thine heart; for the Lord is with thee."

But this was only the beginning of the matter. That night God spoke to Nathan, and gave him a special message to the king. There were deeper things in the mind of God than he could reveal either to Nathan or to David. There was a dwelling place which God sought for and earnestly desired. Neither the curtains of the tabernacle, nor the costly stones, carved cedar, gold and precious stones of the temple, could form the habitation for which he longed. The true in the Spirit" is a holy temple in the Lord, built of living stones, fitly framed together. And this might be built could be only a type of this. He had said, when he ordained the construction of the tabernacle, "I will dwell among the children of Israel." (Ex. 29: 45). But the mystery of the dwelling of God with men and generations, but is now manifest to his saints, is quite another thing—"Christ in you, the hope of glory."

"Habitation of God"

"Go and tell my servant David," God said to the prophet Nathan, "Shalt thou build me a house for me to dwell in? Have I ever reproached my people and said to them, Why build ye not me a house of cedar? Now, therefore, so shalt thou say unto my servant David, Thus saith the Lord of hosts, I took thee from the sheep-fold, from following the sheep, to be ruler over my people, over Israel." When God comes near to us, we are always reminded of our origin, and of what we owe to him. His grace which has brought us out from our past, cannot, must not, be ignored. "And I was with thee whithersoever thou wouldst, and have cut off all thine enemies out of thy sight, and have made thee a great name, like unto the great men that are in the earth." No credit to David for any one thing; the presence of the holy God withers every breath of self-congratulation, and every self-conscious thought. "All things come from thee," said David, later on. All his glory was the presence of his God with him. David had never sought for a great name, but God had given it him, and it remains to this day, for he lives in his eternal Psalms.

And God knew that the heart of David was bound up with his people, and that he did not live for himself, and he said, "Moreover I will appoint a place for my people Israel, and will plant them, that they may dwell in a place of their own, and move no more; neither shall the children of wickedness afflict them any more, as before time." This part of the prophecy has never yet been fulfilled. The afflictions of the Jewish people have been proverbial to this day, and the Germans and Russians oppress them still. But when Israel shall be restored, after the time of the tribulation, during the thousand years (Rev. 20: 3), "they shall sit every man under his vine, and under his fig tree, and none shall make him afraid; for the mouth of the Lord of hosts hath spoken it." (Micah 4: 4). And probably also in the new earth (Rev. 21: 1) the Jews shall have God's promises of perpetual habitation fulfilled to them.

But besides his promises to Israel, the Lord spoke to David personally, "Also the Lord telleth thee that he will Make Thee a House."

And then the prophecy goes on to include Solomon, his immediate successor, and also the great Son of David, the Lord Jesus. "I will set up thy seed after thee . . . and I will establish his kingdom. He shall build a house for my name." This evidently refers to Solomon. But again, "I will establish the throne of his kingdom forever," is the word quoted by the angel Gabriel concerning the Christ, "the Lord God shall give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end." (Luke 1: 32, 33). Again, "I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son," is especially spoken of God's King, "Yet have I set my King upon my holy hill of Zion. I will declare the decree, the Lord hath said unto me, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee." (Ps. 2: 6, 7).

But again the following words apply to Solomon, "If he commit iniquity, I will chasten him with the rod of man and with the stripes of the children of men; but my mercy shall not depart away from him, as I took it from Saul, whom I put away before thee." O, how completely was this fulfilled! And then again, referring to Christ and to his future reign on earth, God says, "And thine house and thy kingdom shall be established forever before thee, thy throne shall be established forever." Many may have been the thoughts passing through the hearts of the prophet and the king, as with reverent minds they sought and "searched diligently . . . what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did point unto." (1. Pet. 1: 10, 11, R.V.) There were depths which they did not understand; God spoke from the standpoint of eternity. All was dim to them beyond the limits of this one life. There is infinity in all the words of God; only as we are ourselves developed by the Holy Spirit can we go on from depth to depth in his Word.

David realized the greatness of Him who had spoken to him; he was confounded, overpowered with the condescension of One so high, who had stooped down to one so low as he. "And what can David say more unto thee? For thou, Lord God, knowest thy servant." That God, who had perfect knowledge of him, who knew him better than he knew himself, could thus speak of him and of his house made him almost speechless, like Peter, when he held the draught of fishes, and said, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord." (Luke 5: 8.) O how this holy reverence for God is ceasing from among us! There is, however, no sign whatever of discouragement in anything which the King says; he looks at his God and sees that it is just like him.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

NATHAN, who in this lesson appears for the first time in the narrative, was probably one of the trusted counsellors of the king, selected by him on account of his piety. It is evident from several incidental remarks that although the form of government, at the time was despotic, that there were some checks on the royal power. The different tribes must have been largely self-governing, with the king as the supreme resort in cases of difficulty. The check which David would be most likely to feel and which would have most weight with him, would be the opinions of the eminent godly men whom he gathered about him. His old friend Gad, who had been with him in his adversity was one of these, and we read of others. At this time Nathan seems to have been the one in whom the king had the greatest confidence. To him David communicates his wish to build a temple for God. He felt self-reproach at living in a beautiful house, while the ark which symbolized God's presence, was in a temporary tent. The project was creditable to him and Nathan on the impulse of the moment approved it. Thinking over it later, under Divine influence, Nathan perceives several objections to the work being done by David. The time was not propitious. The simplicity and majesty of the Divine presence, in contrast with the worship of surrounding nations, was a striking characteristic of the religion of Israel. The people, probably, were not prepared for the change, and it might affect them prejudicially.

There was something awe-inspiring about the plain tent in which the presence of God was manifested which needed no adventitious aid from architectural grandeur. Besides this, David, with all his piety, had led a life of bloodshed. In I. Chron. 22: 8, this is given as the chief objection to his building the Temple. There was an incongruity about this fighting man engaging in temple building. The work of the Lord must be done with clean hands. The purity of his motive was recognized, but Nathan was commissioned to veto the project. If David entertained any exalted ideas or had in his mind any notion that he was doing God some great service by building him a temple he must have read reproof in the message Nathan delivered. God did not need a house to dwell in; it was he who had chosen David; he would build David a house in the sense of caring for his posterity; he was able to provide a place for the whole nation. What could David do for so mighty a Being? Men are not to suppose that God is dependent on them for honor, or that they can confer an obligation on the Maker of the universe. For the rest, the house should be built by a son of David, one who should be as a son of God, under discipline as well as under blessing, as the sons of God in all times must be, for the two go together in the Divine economy. The true temple of God, however, as David probably only dimly understood, was to be built by David's greater Son, who should use living stones, and should himself be the corner-stone. In that Temple God would delight to dwell, and it would never be overthrown.

If he commit iniquity I will chasten him. The statement follows immediately of promise, "He shall be my son." Those who are near to God must expect chastening, because it is more grievous for a Christian to sin than one who is not a Christian. A great preacher draws a parison from the condition of a lawn. Lawn near the house must be kept in condition. Weeds are promptly pulled out of it and it has scarcely any room for the mower. The grass out in meadows knows no such repeated attention. It is thought sufficient to cut once or twice a year; but the grass of a lawn must be continually cut and pruned. The nearer you are to the more frequent will be the trials.

In all the places wherein I have walked. It is well that no church can claim a monopoly of God's presence. During the first French Revolution one of the sans-culottes said to a pious peasant, "We will pull down all your spires churches and take from you every thing that recalls the superstition of the old and everything that speaks to you of God." The peasant was very sorrowful, "I hope you will spare our church," said; "but you cannot remove everything that speaks to us of God. You can reach the stars."

I took thee from the sheep-cote. David knew perfectly well that he was indebted to God for everything he had. He wanted to show his gratitude by building a Temple. People are not always so anxious to prove their sense of obligation; if it were, the cause of foreign missions and other Christian enterprises would not be so crippled by poverty. A person anxious to a man to become security for him a large amount, but not finding the man home explained the matter to his wife. "Certainly," she answered, "my husband will do it. If you will let him know when and where he is needed to attend to the bond, he will come." After the servant was gone, one of the woman's friends who had been present and had heard conversation, called her attention to the fact that if her husband were ever called upon to make good the amount for which he would make himself liable, it would leave the family destitute. The woman replied: "We owe everything to that man. When we were in poverty he came to us and gave us the start we needed. If I lose all through becoming security for him it will only leave us where he found us."

I will appoint a place for my people. "I appear to have made a very bad bargain of life," said a wealthy land-owner a tenant, who in his old age, was dying in poverty. "I do not agree with you," said the old man. "I am content. I do not go into religion to make money, but to do God's work, and he appoints a place for his people."

Shalt thou build me a house? What a man do for God who owns the world and all that is in it? But the man who desires to show gratitude, need be in difficulty for an opportunity. The late Dr. William M. Taylor, of New York, used to tell a characteristic story of his grandfather. He was an old farmer in Scotland. One day he was taking a sack of corn to the mill to be ground. It was thrown across the back of a horse. He wished some one would come and go up the mountain path the horse stumbled and the sack slipped off. The old man tried in vain to replace it. No one man could do it, especially so old a man as the farmer. There was nothing for it but to wait for help. It was an unfrequented road. The farmer waited long. He wished some one would come and he was willing to pay well for assistance. At last to his joy he saw a horseman approaching, but when he came near enough to be recognized, the farmer saw to his dismay that it was the Laird of the Castle. He could not ask the help of so great a man, but the Laird saw his predicament and without being asked, dismounted and went to his help. Between them the sack was put on the horse's back. Mr. Taylor stammered his thanks and admitted that he had expected to pay for help. The Laird heard him through and said, "If when you see a man in a bad fix as you were in just now, you help him, that will be paying me."

Massacres in Crete.

ABLE dispatches from Constantinople of recent date, announce that the newly appointed Governor of Crete has issued a proclamation, on behalf of the Sultan of Turkey, who is the ruler of the island and its quarter of a million inhabitants, offering amnesty to all the Cretans who will lay down their arms and return to peaceful pursuits. It is also announced that an excellent impression has been produced in the island by this offer, and by the promise that the reforms demanded by the Cretans will be immediately granted. It would not surprise the world if the next news we get from the island would be that the Cretans were gathered, instead of pardoned, after laying down their arms. That conduct would be quite in accord with Turkish traditions, and with the course of events in Armenia and elsewhere. But if the Turk is acting honestly for once, he is entitled to public sympathy. The campaign in Crete opened so successfully for the Mohammedans, the mountaineers of Crete, then to despair by the cruelty, oppression, and exactions of the Turkish rulers, rebelled. They used just the excuse for the inauguration of a period of rapine, murder, and outrage which was sweet to the Turk, when his Christians at his mercy. Illustration on this page shows how he proceeded. He did not get at the mountaineers, who had offered provocation. They were safe in their mountain fastnesses, but there were plenty of Christians on the plains who were easy to reach. The Turks sent a war detachment around the coast which had the Cretan villages. After a village had been bombarded, a detachment of troops was sent from the ship to the ruins, and outrage and kill to their content. The correspondent of the Illustrated London News, sent the picture from which this illustration is taken, sketching it as he sat on the rocky summit of the little uninhabited island of St. Theodora. From that point he could count nine different villages on the coast that were burning at the same time, and in the nearest, the wind carried to his ears the shrieks of the men, women, and children, who, after nameless outrages, were being driven into the flames to perish. There was nothing surprising in such scenes. That is the way the Turk acted in Armenia, and how he would treat Christians everywhere if his powers were unlimited. The cause for surprise is found in the proclamation offering amnesty. If the offer is not a cruel trap, as is probable, it may be due to a natural fear on the part of the Sultan that he is dangerously near the limits of European forbearance. Should he keep his promises he would avert for the time the storm that threatened to burst upon his head. He cannot, however, by his late-timed clemency, escape the righteous judgment of God, in whose ears the cry of the victims sounds like the voice of the martyrs beneath the altar which the seer heard:

How long O Lord, only and true, dost thou wait, and avenge our blood on them that dwell on earth. Rev. 18:20.

Justly Suspected.

A physician was arrested and haled to a police station in New York a few days ago on suspicion of being a thief. He had called on another physician to whom he was not personally known and told him that he wished to put him on his guard against a young man who was going around to physicians' offices and while waiting for consultation stealing any valuables he could lay his hands upon. Having given the warning he went away, and as he walked down the street he saw the sign of another physician on the opposite side. He crossed over and left the same warning there. The physician on whom he called first was watching him and was not satisfied of his honesty. He doubted whether any man would be so concerned for the welfare of others that he would spend time in thus going from house to house warning people that they were liable to be robbed. It seemed to him very probable that his late visitor was planning just such a robbery himself. He therefore went out and hunted up a policeman, who at his request followed the man and arrested him just as he was entering the house of another physician to give him a warning like that he had given think out some way of saving him from it, he offers a million dollars to the man who will cure him. As may be imagined many are anxious to try. One man is confident he could effect a cure by sending a current of electricity of a hundred thousand volts through his brain. The merchant would willingly submit to that, or any other mode of treatment, however painful it might be, if it would restore his sight, but he is unwilling to undergo torture or risk his life without some good ground for hoping that it would benefit him. He, therefore, refuses to submit himself to experiment. Recently a poor man, afflicted with the same malady, went to the merchant and offered himself as a substitute. His offer was accepted. Now, when some one anxious to earn the million dollar fee, proposes to try some experiment on the merchant's eyes, he is told to try it first on the poor man. It is a curious arrangement by which the cost of the treatment is divided, one man bearing the expense and the other the pain of the experiments. It is, however, mutually satisfactory, and both are keenly desirous of success. Whenever the poor man is cured the merchant stands pledged to undergo the treatment that cures him and to pay a million dollars reward. It is a pity that people are not as anxious to obtain spiritual sight. That more precious boon Christ offers without grees in one direction, and the needle covered by the right hand moves fifteen degrees in the opposite direction. If the room be darkened and a photographic plate, introduced between the hands and the needles, the result shows that rays of light have proceeded from the hands. Evidently thought is not so unsubstantial a thing as we have been accustomed to believe. If, as it appears, it can emit light and can be photographed, it must have a distinct existence for which we are responsible, before it is embodied in word and act. This fact helps us to understand how sinful man must appear in the eyes of Him of whom it is said:

The Lord knoweth the thoughts of man. Ps. 94:11.)

A Clue to Ownership.

An advertisement was printed last week in a daily journal of New York stating that, "if Robert wished to recover his parrot," he could do so by calling at a certain address and paying expenses. A reporter, whose curiosity had been stirred by the wording of the advertisement, called at the address given and asked its meaning. The advertiser admitted that she did not know who "Robert" was. She said that her husband had bought a parrot which talked volubly. Certain circumstances had come to his knowledge afterward which led him to believe that the persons who sold him the bird had not acquired it honestly. Being honest people themselves they wished to find the rightful owner, but did not know how to discover him. The parrot had furnished the only promising clue. It was continually calling for "Robert," and the inference was drawn that it had been in some home where Robert was often called. The idea of publishing an advertisement inviting Robert to come for the bird was accordingly adopted. It would be well if the world, reasoning on the same lines, could always infer to whom the Christian belongs. Frequent parrot-like references to his Lord would savor of cant in a man, but his conversation, even with people who know not God, should be of such a character as to show to whom he gives allegiance.

They took knowledge of them that had been with Jesus. Acts 4:13.)

The Czar on a Street Car.

An interesting story of the young Emperor of Russia comes from St. Petersburg. It appears that there exists among the aristocratic officers of the army a rather strict idea of what an officer may do in the way of mingling with the common people, and what he must not do. There is no absolute code of regulations on the subject, but the restrictions are as definite as laws. One day a young officer found himself in the dilemma of being obliged either to be late on duty or take a street car, either of which was an offence. He took the street car, but several officers saw him alight, and they reported seeing him. He was speedily taken to task for disgracing his uniform, and after a few days of persecution he was urged to resign his commission, as he could never wipe out the disgrace. The young officer was poor, his family would be distressed by his losing his position, and he would be practically ruined by yielding. He had a friend in the War Department to whom he communicated his situation, and by him the affair was brought before the Czar. Nicholas was very indignant when he heard of it. Calling an adjutant to accompany him, he started out, walked a short distance and boarded a street car on which he rode to the barracks to which the persecuted officer belonged. He alighted in full view of a group of officers who reverently saluted him. Since that time there has been peace in the officers' quarters of the regiment, and the young officer has had no further trouble. As the Czar thought it no humiliation to use the common conveyance, it could be no humiliation for his officer to do so. The Christian who performs a menial service for his brother has similar justification for his conduct. His Master after doing lowly service said:

Whoever has loved me, who has kept my commandments, that he may love his brother who loves him, I will love him, and I will visit him, and I will keep him from sinning. 1 John 2:10.)

at the other two houses. His arrest was a surprise and it aroused his indignation. He was easily able to prove his identity and was promptly released, but he felt very sore at a brother physician to whom he had tried to render a service, mistaking him for a thief. This is not by any means the first time that a disinterested man has been suspected of ignoble motives. The world is very sceptical about any one being disinterested. It would not be so if it saw every Christian obey the apostolic precept:

Let no man seek his own, but each his neighbor's. 1 Cor. 13:12 R. V.

A Million Dollar Fee.

The result of an offer of a million dollars as a fee for the cure of defective eyesight is described in the New York Sun. The offer is genuine, and it is made by a wealthy New York merchant who is able and willing to pay a million dollars to any physician or oculist who will restore to him the power of vision which is almost lost. Sometime ago he noticed that his eyesight was beginning to fail, and it has been growing rapidly worse until now he can scarcely tell night from day. The oculists whom he has consulted agree that he is suffering from paralysis of the optic nerve, and believe that nothing can save him from total blindness. He dreads that fate, and, as an inducement to them to money and without price, and to those who doubt there are multitudes now who can say like the blind man in the Gospel:

He said to a man who was blind from whence he is, and yet he hath opened mine eyes. John 9:30.

Photographs of Thought.

One of the most remarkable discoveries of recent times was announced a few days ago to the Paris Academy of Medicine, by the discoverer, Dr. Baraduc, a well-known electropathic physician. His discovery is that thought can be photographed. He showed the process by actual experiment. A person was placed in a dark room and told to place his hand on a photographic plate. He was then directed to concentrate his thought on some object and remain quiet, thinking for some minutes of that object and no other. The plate was then developed, the man previously stating that he had been thinking of his child. When the plate was exhibited, there was upon it the child's portrait. A hint of the principle of the phenomenon was given by another experiment. In this, a person holds his hands over magneto-plates on which highly sensitive copper needles are fixed, like the needle of the mariner's compass. A sheet of glass covers the needles and prevents their being moved by a breath. In a few moments the needle covered by the left hand moves five de-

Our Sunday School Missionary Tells of his Seventeen Years' Work in the Field — A Grand Showing of Spiritual Results.

Of the thousands of readers of this journal who have felt a warm interest in the spiritual work of Rev. Geo. W. Sharp, THE CHRISTIAN HERALD Sunday School Missionary in the Southwest, the following concise report from Mr. Sharp will be read with keen appreciation. In much of the work concerning which he writes, our readers have an active personal share. Many have contributed of their means towards its successful prosecution for several years past. Mr. Sharp writes as follows:

"THE CHRISTIAN HERALD began its benevolent work in the Sunday School mission field June 1, 1891. I herewith furnish it a statement of the work up to the first of June of this year. A fire in Kirksville several years ago burned the building in which I had my office, and such of my 'daily journals' as were in it were destroyed. Fortunately, a little while before the fire I had published a very brief summary of my work and these publications answer pretty fully the place of the lost records, not in all the details, but in the aggregate. I have all subsequent records. The records usually furnished an underestimate of the number of teachers and scholars in the new schools, because many of them were organized on week nights, and were much more numerous attended on Sundays. The actual attendance was more nearly shown by reports from the schools about a month after their organization. But even these reports, as I have learned by later visitation and correspondence, fell far below the full attendance of many prosperous schools, some of which have doubled and trebled in a few months after they were planted. Taking all available facts into careful consideration, the following estimate, I am confident, is rather under than over the whole attendance. I entered the American Sunday School Union Feb. 1, 1879. For the seventeen years and four months from that time to June 1, the estimates are as follows: Whole number of schools organized, addressed, or otherwise aided, 685, having 4,625 teachers, and 39,616 scholars — 44,241 teachers and scholars.

"The reports of visits to schools reorganized, and visits to schools previously reported began in 1890, and do not include that feature of the work prior to that date. Since then they have been as follows: Schools reorganized 15, having 67 teachers and 624 scholars. Visits to schools previously reported 193, having 1,284 teachers and 14,585 scholars.

"Sermons and addresses delivered during the whole period, 3,483; visits to families, 7,745; Bibles and Testaments distributed, 3,032. This includes the number distributed from my office, but does not include those distributed from other sources where they were more convenient. Missionary letters and cards written, 7,893; miles traveled, 81,564, or more than three times the circumference of the whole earth, a great deal of the time by private conveyance—in buggy or wagon, on horseback or on foot, as circumstance required. I have conducted or assisted about 75 protracted meetings, in which I have witnessed many hundreds of conversions and additions to churches, and have attended and aided about 70 other meetings in the nature of Sunday School Institutes and Conventions—township, county, district, and State. I have also urged communities to erect church houses, in some places writing out subscription papers and delivering addresses to encourage the work of building; and in many places where the schools were organized in halls, store-rooms and school-houses, they now have comfortable houses of worship and flourishing churches.

"But great as have been the blessings of God in connection with my labors in conversions, etc., it was to have been hoped that far greater results would follow through the labors of others in places where churches have been planted, and I rejoice to know that such has been the case. I have especially sought to establish schools and preach the Gospel in sermons and addresses in the plainest, simplest manner possible, in the very poorest, darkest, most neglected places in my field—places where there was neither Sunday School, church organization nor regular preaching, and at some places where a sermon had not been preached for two and three years, and where I neither found, nor expected to find, many of the comforts of life; often the very reverse. But of this and the hardships and sufferings through which I have passed, I forbear to speak particularly. Sometimes

Deep waters crossed life's pathway,
The hedge of thorns was sharp.

But hitherto the Lord hath led me. His grace has been sufficient for me. I praise him for his numberless mercies and blessings. I heartily thank all who have aided me in this great and growing field of probably more than a million people.

My long experience has impressed me deeply with the great work of the American Sunday School Union, the great need there is for it, and its wonderful adaptation to it. And I am deeply sensible of the lasting gratitude I owe THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and its readers for the great help of their contributions, prayers, and kind words. I have not always found time to answer all the letters of encouragement received, as I wished to do.

The third annual report of the John Crear fund, a legacy of $50,000 left to the American Sunday School Union for the purpose of gathering the neglected children of the rural districts into Sabbath Schools, has been issued. During three years no less than 155 new Sunday Schools have been organized, with 590 teachers and 5,228 scholars, and a great amount of work done in the way of organizing and aiding.

The Seventy-second Annual report of the American Sunday School Union, just issued, contains some very interesting statements in connection with the pioneer work of its missionaries in the remote sections of certain Western States. Much of the work is similar to that now being done by our own missionary, Rev. Mr. Sharp, in Missouri, in districts that have not heretofore enjoyed any Sunday School or church privileges. Some have their field of effort among the ranchmen and workers on the great cattle ranges of the west (as described by Missionaries Lain and Kiser, in these pages several weeks ago.) Our illustration on this page, reproduced from a photograph taken by one of the Missionaries, shows the class of men with whom these faithful and energetic church and Sunday School organizers have to labor. From such people it is not at all unusual for the missionary to receive a greeting such as that described by Missionary J. W. Armstrong of the State of Washington:

"In one district I inquired of a man if they had a Sunday School in the community, and he said, 'No, we don't need any; you git along; our children are spoiled by sich hifalutin' fellers like you.' They think they know more than pap or mam now.' I visited the community and found that the children were accustomed to running along the streams on the Lord's day, fishing and hunting, and then this was followed up during the week by dancing. I organized a school then and brought the children in.

Fifty Years a Pastor.

Dr. A. S. Freeman Celebrates the Fifty Anniversary of His Settlement as Presbyterian Pastor at Haverstraw, N. Y.

A NOTABLE anniversary in church circles at Haverstraw, N. Y., was celebrated recently. Fifty years ago a young man who had just completed his studies at Union Theological Sem-and New York University, arrived in town, and on the invitation of the Central Presbyterian Church commenced his labors as its pastor. He has been there ever since, preaching, teaching, encouraging the struggling, comforting the mourner and seeking earnestly to win souls for Christ. During that long period his church, the Christian community and town itself have witnessed his untiring efforts and they joined cordially in congratulating the veteran pastor, who in his seventy-second year refuses to consider himself old man.

The anniversary exercises commenced on June 28 with a musical service in the Opera House. As had been foreseen by the church office the Central Church would not be large enough to hold all who would want to hear Dr. Freeman preach his jubilee sermon. The large building was crowded to its utmost capacity. It had been elaborately decorated for the occasion, and on a platform, surrounded by his friends, sat the venerable pastor, still so stout and vigorous, alert of eye, a clear voice, and mentally acute in his youth. The choir appropriately sang the Te Deum, and at prayer had been offered by a brother minister, Dr. Freeman preached from the text: "A jubilee shall thy fiftieth year be unto you" (Leviticus 5: 11). He recalled the memory of the day when as a young man twenty-two he came among the people and mentioned with loving recollection the names of some who had welcomed him then, but who since joined the greater church above. Some of his hearers who sat in the house with their grown children around them, he said, were in the infant class when he began his ministrations. Such changes had time wrought. During his labors in Haverstraw Dr. Freeman said he had preached about six thousand sermons, had received over nine hundred persons into church communion, had united in marriage over five hundred couples and had officiated at nearly two hundred funerals. The heartiness with which the congregation crowded around him at the conclusion of his sermon, grasp his hand was a plain testimony to the efficiency of all this work.

On the following day the Presbytery of Hudson County claimed its share in the congratulatory movement, and in the evening the Christian Endeavor Society and the Sunday School held a joint meeting to express their indebtedness to the pastor. The third day was the celebration. Haverstraw put on gala attire, flags waved from the public building and a meeting was held in the Opera House at which clergymen of other denominations and public officials testified to the value of the services which Dr. Freeman has rendered to the community during the past half century.

Or, as Rev. W. R. Winans of Oregon, pictures it:

One day I drove into a mining camp, and I was afterward told that men in the saloon bet drinks on me as I passed through as to who and what I was. In the same place the children who came to the children's meeting did not seem to know who Jesus was, nor whether he was God or simply a man.

The latest Annual report shows that the American Sunday School Union has 135 men in the field under commission:

The result of their labors 127 new Sunday Schools were organized, having 6,325 teachers, 143 were reorganized, and 144 were given to existing schools. In the same place the children who came to the children's meeting did not seem to know who Jesus was, nor whether he was God or simply a man. How Grandma was Won.

THE first hint of the coming Fourth of July was in the air that summer night, when Grandmother Murray told us how she spent it when she was young. Some boys in the street were firing off torpedoes, and they sputtered and exploded with the silly vehemence characteristic of such small affairs. Next day, a little fellow had a pack of fireworks, which, stirred to emulation by the owners of the torpedoes, he lit and fired off one by one.

"I am thankful," said Mildred, "that you can have a comparatively quiet Fourth in these days. We cannot easily go out of town, but we do not have our ears deafened as we used to, by the incessant noise of the people who keep Independence Day. This year it was almost like Sunday; it was so quiet. A change for the better, I say."

"Vell," said Grandmother Murray, dropping her knitting and sitting up very straight in her chair, "I for my part like the good old way better than the modern way. We used to enjoy the Fourth when I was a girl. It was anticipated as eagerly as Christmas, and we had a good time—the best time of the summer then. Shall I tell you about it, or will it tire you?"

"Do tell about it, grandmother," said Mildred, and the girls, Mildred, Lucy, and Wam, drew their chairs closer. I brought me near the dear old lady, and she began to tell in her low, clear voice, the color coming and going in her delicate old face, and her wrinkled hands moving slowly as she told her needles. She was a picture to look at with her beautiful profile, her snowy hair, and the white kerchief folded over her black satin gown. There are few grayer women than our Grandmother Murray, for all the four-score years.

We lived opposite the Methodist Church in our young days," she began, "and when we children woke up Fourth morning, it was always decorated with flags; they floated from all churches, but the Methodist Church not only had a big banner flung to the breeze from the roof, but its columns and pillars were wreathed with red, white and blue festoons, mingled with evergreen garlands. It was most elegant to see. Early in the morning the church bells rang, gaily and loudly, and the cannon boomed for gladness, and the city was full of rejoicing. So the soldiers were astir, ready for the march to the Town Hall, and the Sunday School children, too. The girls all in white frocks, with blue and red sashes; the boys in buff, white trousers with blue jackets and gilt buttons—every boy with a red, white and blue rosette. We all fell into line and marched through the streets, and then assembled on the Common, where stood the great man, a judge, or the Governor, or stately clergyman, read the Declaration of Independence, and when that was done somebody prayed, and then some other body made a speech, and we sang some patriotic ode like, 'Our Fathers' Guide, to Thee,' or 'Hail Columbia,' or the 'Star Spangled Banner.' After the religious and patriotic exercises were over, we had refreshments, and such loads of cake as disappeared then, such mounds of sandwiches, and such barrels of lemonade! It was on a Fourth of July I first met your grandfather, girls."

"It was?" cried Lucy. "No wonder you love the day!"

Yes, indeed, and the whole thing was so funny. I had on a mull gown, ruffled and trimmed with fluffy lace, not as simple as I ought to have had, but mother was indulgent, and let me have my way. As we marched along we had to pass a dark stream of water called the Race. It turned the machinery of some paper and cotton mills, and it never looked happy and light-hearted like a river, but always solemn and mournful, as if it had to work hard, and had no time to be merry. We were just passing a bend in the Race, when there came a gust of wind and it blew my pretty blue parasol clear out of my hand, and into the very middle of the stream. I felt dreadfully, for I was proud of my parasol, and I was afraid mother would think I had been careless, but I shut my lips tight, and winked back my tears, and just marched on.

"There's no getting that parasol back, little girl," cried a big boy. "It's going out to the ocean straight."

"No," said another, "its going into the teeth of the big wheels, and you'll never see it again."

"It cannot be helped," I said. "I'm sorry, but I'm not going to spoil the Fourth of July with crying over a parasol."

"That was only accident Number One. By the time we reached the Common, my pretty gown looked dragged and dirty, and a bit of my ruffle had come loose and been stepped on. I felt much distressed, but I fortunately thought of a text I had lately learned about your adorning not being of pearls and brodered raiment, and that kept me up! The last straw was reached when Rulif Maconber spilled a glass of lemonade in my lap through his clumsiness. He was the most awkward lad. I was frantic in my mind then, for I was a spectacle to gaze at, but I was so sorry for him, that I controlled myself. I was a sight to behold! Not fit to march home with all the nice-looking children whom nothing ever happened to. What would my dear tidy mother say to me? I was much disturbed when, 'Jump into the carriage Miss Betty,' said a pleasant voice, 'and I'll drive you home.'

"It was young Chris Murray, on his first vacation from college, and he told me afterward that he fell in love with me that Fourth, all dragged and soiled and forlorn as I was. Any girl who could keep her temper as I did, he felt was a girl to tie to. And," added grandmother, musingly, "we were very happy together for fifty years, Chris and I."

We who listened, were silent then. We knew what a beautiful love-match it had been, and how sweet, and strong, and true had been the bond uniting those married friends; what a source of blessing that home had been, and how much good they had done to their generation. In the whole world there is no more perfect type of heaven than a Christian household, where husband and wife are united in love and fidelity, and both are serving the Master.

"Yes," said Grandmother Murray, going on, as if she had not paused, "we had fifty years of joy and sorrow, shared here; we shall have all eternity and no sorrow, there!" A look of rapt illumination glowed in her countenance.

"Girls," she added, "I've often been grateful to my dear mother for teaching me not to make a fuss, to keep from showing impatience; to hold my tongue and my face in check, even when I was a child. Much of my life's happiness has come from that habit of outward serenity."

"And," she went on again, "I believe in patriotism, I believe in big guns, and flying flags, and drums, and bugles, and processions, and fireworks on the Fourth. I believe in loving my country and standing up for her, and never being ashamed of her, dear land of the free, and home of the brave. I believe in celebrating the Fourth of July! Even with thunder of cannon, and blazing of rockets, and beating of drums."

"So do we all of us, dear grandmother," said Mildred, soothingly.

Then Lucy went to the piano and struck up America," and we sang,
My Country 'tis of Thee.

The Bible in Armenia.

One notable result of the Armenian persecution has been to greatly increase the love and reverence of the Armenian people for the Bible. Rev. M. Bowen, a missionary, writes: Prof. Rendell Harris, of Cambridge University, has recently gone into the Oorfa region with his wife, in the hope of being able to help in the relief work. He writes me from Aintab, that there is a great demand for Bibles in excess of the supply; the fact is we are in the midst of an increased and increasing interest in religion; the meetings are thronged, and the tide is rising. Now is the time to distribute Scriptures freely. In many other places also, the disposition to read the Bible is stronger than has ever been known. If one poor person receives a copy, it finds its way to the hands of others too poor to buy for themselves, by whom it is borrowed and read with great eagerness and reverence. In many places where Bibles have been carefully stored away in closets, they are now taken down and eagerly searched for the consolations which these poor people so deeply crave. At one place, a Bible left some two years ago in a Turkish prison is reported to be now doing a good work among the prisoners confined there. One colporteur describes it as one of the pleasantest experiences of his whole life to be permitted to visit the devastated villages, carrying to the impoverished people clothing and food, but above all things else, carrying to them the Bible, which the people eagerly welcome with tears of gratitude. The book must be distributed far and wide, whether money can be paid for it or not.

Bibles Burned in Peru.

It will be remembered by many readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD that a report was published several months ago to the effect that the Mayor of San Miguel, Peru, had seized and caused to be burned in the public square all the Bibles contained in the local agency of the American Bible Society. Particulars of the event have lately appeared in a newspaper of Callao. These show that the shameless proceeding was instigated by the parish priest in violation of the rights of property and without lawful authority. He wrote to the Alcalde (Mayor) requesting that the Bibles be seized and burned. They were seized and delivered to the priest who gave therefor this receipt:

I have received of the alcalde, Hon. Jose Quiros, on account of the charges I have made, the following books which are all Protestant: 23 Bibles of different sizes, 26 Testaments, 37 Gospels, 8 Psalms, and 9 Gospel Hymns, all to be burned in the square of this city; and in testimony of the same, I give these presents.

JEAN B. QUIROY.

The burning took place in the presence of a large crowd. Such an act speaks more eloquently than words of the dense religious ignorance, fanaticism and intolerance that still prevail in Peru. Christians everywhere should pray for its enlightenment.

In striking contrast with this are the facts recorded in a letter from Rev. I. M. Channon, from Kusaie, Gilbert Islands. There the Bible has been translated into a heathen tongue and given to the people, so lately savages, and they are now diligently studying it.

Hungary's Gala Year.

The Climax of the Millennial Festival—The New Parliament Buildings.

DURING the past month the brilliant festivities at Budapest, in connection with the Hungarian Millennial Exhibition, reached their height, the climax being the fetes and demonstrations in celebration of the anniversary of the coronation of Francis Joseph I. On that occasion, the splendid new houses of Parliament were the centre of universal interest. The Parliament Buildings (shown in the illustration on this page), are situated close to the river Danube, and facing the old Royal Castle at Buda. It is said that no existing Houses of Parliament can compare in architectural beauty or interior decorations with these buildings, which far surpass those at Westminster. The Hungarians have such an intense love of liberty that they have erected this grand edifice at a cost of almost sixteen million florins. No one homogeneous style has been adhered to; in the lofty cupola a resemblance to the Byzantine is observable, but Italian Gothic prevails. This mixture of styles, of course, it shares with most modern monumental buildings. The inside of the edifice is of fabulous magnificence, glittering with granite, marble, and gold. The grand staircase and the extensive lobbies are decorated with great magnificence. Though ten years have elapsed since the building was begun, the interior is not yet wholly finished. Some eighty over life-sized figures of Hungarian kings and heroes serve to adorn the House of Commons, and many statues of magnates, the lobbies and halls.

About one hundred Congresses are to be held at Budapest during the present summer, representing the various literary, scientific, artistic, and other institutions and societies. On July 5, a superb monument to Arpad, the founder of the Hungarian state and its first monarch, was unveiled in the great Plain of Pustaszer, where he and the representatives of the people made their first Constitutional agreement. Six other great historical monuments are to be unveiled at different places between July 19 and Oct. 18. On Aug. 23, the new Parliament building will be formally opened. One highly important international event will be the opening of public traffic on the new canal at the Iron Gate in the Danube near Orsova, on Sept. 27.

The canal as now carried out by Hungary alone, will cost five million florins, while the cost of the whole undertaking will amount to eighteen million florins. Although the blasting was begun in 1890, yet the work will not be finished for another year or more. The loss of life connected with it has been great, some two hundred men having been drowned or killed while blasting. The canal is two kilometres long and seventy-three metres broad, whereas the Suez Canal is only twenty-seven metres, and the Baltic Canal thirty-two metres broad.

A Soldier's Bible.

A Virginia paper relates that W. H. Rains of Treaskies, Lancaster County, has in his possession a soiled and tattered Bible which he picked up on the battlefield of the second Chancellorsville, shortly after the battle. Its leaves bear this inscription: "O, may I its pages study and take heed, God being my helper. Wm. Owen, Co. K, N. Y. Volunteers." Over thirty have passed since the Bible was dropped on the field of strife. Now that it has been so strangely recovered, it will doubtless be cherished as a sacred memento of those anguished days when mothers were praying for their absent sons, many of whom they should never see again on earth.

What Keeps Us Back.

WE all need a more intense Christian life, quicker heart-throb of affection, and stouter grip of duty. I am yet to find the man who has come up to the standard of Christian character which he has marked out for himself. We can, sometimes, in looking back upon our life, find that there were times when we were progressing quite rapidly in Christian experience; but when we look over the whole field of our progress, we are amazed that we have made so little advancement, that we have gone ten miles where we ought to have gone twenty, that there are so many heights above that we might have attained with only a little more courage and persistence. If we are in a public conveyance, and we do not get on as fast as we want to; if the speed of our travel does not correspond with the timetable, we look out of the window, and wonder what is the matter, and ask questions as to why all this tardiness, and are impatient until we have found out.

How strange it is that in this journey heavenward, in which so much more is involved, we should be so well satisfied with slowness of progress, or with no progress at all. I think we are all asking ourselves the questions: What detains us? What discomfits us? What upsets us? Why am I here on this low level of Christian experience when I might have gone farther on in acquaintance with God, and farther up in the attainment of a heroic Christian character?

One reason is the depressed religious and moral atmosphere all about us. It is a simple fact that we have very few specimens of eminent Christian character in our day. We are apt to be contented with being just what our fellows are. If they have gained fifteen degrees of spiritual life, we want just fifteen degrees and no more. We look at some man moderately consistent in the Church of God, and we say, "If I could only live as he lives, I would be satisfied; if I could only have his consecration to God, that would do." And then we stop and seat ourselves in some prayer-meeting, and look around and see how many of the same kind of men are there. We need to recognize the fact that there is all around about us in this day a depressed religious atmosphere. There are few persons in the Church of God at this day, if there ever have been, whom we can afford to copy. I remember very well, when at school, I made the same mistake all the way down on every line, to the bottom of the page. And depend upon it, when we attempt to copy any man's Christian character, we copy all the slips, all the faults, all the defects. There is only one great example, and that is the example of Jesus Christ, so perfect that it is beyond all criticism, and the nearer we come to that the nearer we come to a thorough consecration to God.

I will say that if there were in your employ in the store a boy so unfaithful to your interests as we have been to our Master, you would not have patience with him for a single week. After the first day you would have discharged him. You would have said to such an one: "You have no regard for my interests. I am certain that you never can faithfully serve me with your ideas of what is right in a store." Yet God has sent us out in the world. He has offered us the largest wages; he has told us our chief business is to serve him; and yet at what a poor rate we have gone on in his service. I think the very first thing to do is to explore our own spiritual beggary. I think the Church of Christ will never march to a higher standard of Christian character until it finds out its own leanness in its present condition. Oh! for more faith and consecration. Instead of being satisfied when we have come up beside those who are just ordinary Christians in the Church, we must surpass them in our spirit of zeal, and in our faithfulness of service.

Challenged.

A DOCTOR challenged the proprietor of a soap factory to mortal combat on account of slanderous utterances. Here is the body of the letter, poor spelling and all:

"Sir I understand from Good Authority that you have been defaming my character I grant you the privilege of choosing between Long and Short Swords or pistols and the time and place. You will meet me with your Second. Waiting a reply I remain &c."

It is a mystery to us how the taking of another's life can cure defamation. If the proprietor of the soap factory was guilty of slander, he ought, to say the least, to have been dropped into his own vats,—the most appropriate punishment for falsehood being a plunge in lye. But not knowing either of the parties, nor the charges made, we are disposed to think that the derogatory statements were true, for duelling is murder, and if a man wishes to commit murder, we are ready to think him guilty of any other possible crime. Life is short enough at the longest, and we had better not do anything in its abbreviation. The world is large enough for us and our enemies. If the two parties just now spoken of cannot stand it anywhere near each other, we propose that the doctor set up medical practice on Montauk Point, and the proprietor start a soap factory in the south of Florida. That would be safest for them, being beyond the reach of each other's short swords, and it would be an improvement to all the intermediate neighborhoods.

For Sale.

WE read some time ago that the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky was for sale. It is a great place of caverns and labyrinths, visited only by torches, its roofs illumined by rockets, sunlight finding no entrance there.

Offered for sale? It is a most enchanting place to visit, but it is the last property on earth we want to purchase. Who would want to buy the darkness. Rather should we prefer a half acre of sunlit land than ten miles of gloomy substratum. Yet ever and anon there are mammoth caves in the market. Gloomy books, gloomy theories, gloomy dispositions. Sometimes, while we read or listen or associate, we feel a chill creeping up our back, and a shadow falling upon our eyes, and we are overcome with depression, till some bright face or paragraph breaks upon us from an open door or portfolio. We would not give ten cents for all the caverns ever created. Give us a mountain-top of bracing air and wide prospect, and you may have the Mammoth Cave and all the other dampness.

Take the Wagon.

WE read that a merchant prince, the other day, not finding his carriage, got in his dry-goods wagon and rode to his place of business. The reason we do not get on better with our secular and religious work is that we start too late, and are apt to wait for the carriage. The worms are all caught before our birds get there. A day that does not begin before eight o'clock is apt not to begin at all. The vast majority of men are just too late in matters of business as well as in matters of the soul. We are all waiting for the carriage. We want to go in style, and be highly appreciated as we go along, and so fail of reaching the terminus in time. It is the men who are willing to walk, or take the first wagon that comes, who get set down at the point of honor and success. We have tens of thousands of Christians who would like to do good, but who want the work highly elegant and respectable. They let their entire day of opportunity go by while they are waiting for the carriage.

The Milwaukee Convention.

ON the opposite page is a picture, for which we are indebted to the Milwaukee Sentinel, of the magnificent Exposition building in which the Baptist Young People's Union will this week hold its sixth International Convention. When at last year's Convention at Baltimore, Md., it was voted to hold the 1886 Convention at Milwaukee, Wis., the gratification manifested by the delegates from that city plainly showed how warm would be the welcome the Union would receive. Preparations were commenced at an early date, and when the delegates begin to pour into the city to-day from the Departments of the Gold, the Red, the Blue, and the Green, they will find their hosts thoroughly organized to give them a truly Western greeting. All the Baptist Churches and missions in the city will have open doors to-night, and in each there will be songs of praise and many prayers for the blessing of God on the mighty gathering. Thursday is the first day of the Convention proper. The meetings begin at 6:30 A. M. with four prayer meetings, which will be held in four Baptist churches in different quarters of the city. At ten o'clock the great meeting in the Exposition Building will be called to order under the presidency of Mr. John H. Chapman, the President of the Union. Dr. Wilkins will read his report of progress which, it is understood, is of a most encouraging character. There will be an afternoon session, followed by four Workers' Conferences in adjacent churches at which various special departments of work will be considered. These are: The Prayer Meeting; Tracts and Publications; Temperance and Evangelism, and the State and Provincial Unions. These Workers' Conferences were found especially helpful last year and they will attract still larger numbers at this Convention. The evening session in the Exposition Building will deal with the same lines of work, each of which has a speaker of practical experience to speak upon it. Similar meetings will be held on Friday, varied by the State and Provincial Rallies when the delegations will march from the Exposition Building to the buildings assigned respectively to them, and will there hold informal reception meetings. Saturday morning will be given to the rallies of the four great Departments. The afternoon session is the property of the Juniors and will be a pleasant surprise to those delegates who do not know the progress that has been made in this department. Three sessions on Sunday, closing with the great Consecration Meeting, will bring this Convention to a conclusion. That it will be a time of enthusiasm, stimulus and abiding helpfulness there can be no doubt.

The Ocean Grove Season was closed on June 28. Rev. R. J. Daniels had charge of the Holiness meeting, and Rev. C. H. Yarnall of the Young People's meeting. The latter preached in the Auditorium. The surf meeting at six o'clock attracted five thousand persons to the shore.

Dr. Geo. F. Pentecost and Dr. A. T. H. are to preach in New York during the summer. Pentecost preaches for Dr. John Hall, who is holding the meeting of the Evangelical Alliance, and Dr. H. H. Pierson will preach in Dr. Crosby's old church for his friend, Dr. David.

Evangelist Corder has been conducting meetings at Perry, Ind., with remarkable success. It became necessary to remove the meetings to a hall holding two thousand persons and this frequently being inconveniently crowded. During the first week of the services two hundred persons made profession of faith.

The Enormous Wealth of the Late Hirsch, the famous Jewish philanthropist, is stated by an English journal, ultimately his granddaughter, the child of his deceased son, to be $10,000,000. He was a Catholic. It is fortunate for Baron Hirsch's old enterprises that he endowed them with for their permanent support during his life.

Bishop Abram Grant, who Presided at the recent New York State Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was born in 1812 and was sold in 1864 for six thousand dollars Confederate money. At the close of the Washington Christian Endeavor Convention, Dr. F. E. Clark will set out for Europe, and be absent from this country a year. Dr. Clark will spend a large part of the year in the interest of Christian Endeavor work, as Societies are increasing rapidly in that country. He will also visit India, Australia or South Africa, and possibly Japan and China.

The First National Convention of Methodist Christian Endeavor Societies was held recently at Zacatecas. Delegates came from various parts of the country, from Yucatan, and from Vera Cruz from Sonora. The usual features of a C. E. Convention were successful in Mexico as in the United States. Some Endeavorers rode five days on their backs in order to be present, and two walked a Guadalajara, 150 miles distant.

The Independent Publishes an Important Temperance fact: In the excavation of the Temple of Delphi, by the French, an important inscription has been found which contains some prescriptions on the diet of the athletes. Among other things, it is one which forbids them the use of wine. New wine, of course, is not intoxicating wine; it is wine that has become thoroughly alcoholic but has not been mellowed by age.

The Washington Correspondent of the Christian Intelligencer reports that saloon-keepers at that city are bitter and pronounced opponents of the bicycle. Their customers have taken to riding on the streets and into the country, leaving their parlors and saloons empty. The saloon-keepers, smoking or playing billiards or cards. The correspondent states that personally knows of more than one wife who, thanking God for her husband's deliverance from intemperance through the bicycle.

Rev. and Mrs. Nikambe, the Hindu Christian workers from Bombay, whose portraits appeared last week in this journal, have a deeply interesting story to tell of life and work among their countrymen, and of the conditions of life in India. Mrs. Nikambe has been very successful among the child-wives and widows. Any one desiring to hear their lecture, which is intensely interesting and instructive, may communicate with them by addressing them in the care of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, Bible House, New York.

Pundita Ramabai, who was severely crippled in this country some years ago for not leaving her school near Bombay, distinctly Christian, has made a statement which places her attitude among her people beyond mistake. Twelve of the windows in the school recently made public profession of Christianity. A disturbance followed, which the young men of the school developed into a riot. Pundita Ramabai bravely faced the hall full of enraged students and having declared that she had kept her promise not to use violence in favor of Christianity, stated her conviction that Hinduism was the cause of the degradation of the community and that Christianity was the only hope. Her courageous words calmed the storm and peace was restored.

J. T. Hildreth, Nebr. What is meant in Heb. 6: 18, by the "two immutable things" in which it was impossible for God to lie?

The "two immutable things" are his word of counsel, and his oath, (see v. 17.) This is done after the manner of confirming covenants in which the oath is superadded to the word, and the Almighty was thus pleased to demonstrate to "the heirs of promise" beyond a question, the strength, endurance, and steadfastness of the divine promise.

J. At the Atlanta Exposition, there were many nude figures in the most public places; they were beautiful specimens, yet so true to nature that no modest person could look upon them without blushing. Do you not think such exhibitions cause evil thoughts in the minds of many people?

The average public taste is not educated up to the appreciation of such works of art, and they are consequently liable to be misunderstood, and therefore to be more likely to do harm than good. While they may be entirely suitable for an exhibition open to artists only, we do not believe they are helpful to simple minds, but rather the reverse, and therefore undesirable in a popular exhibition.

J. V., Edentown, O. Why is the Bible called the Bible?

It is a term that has been Anglicized from Latin, Biblia, and the Greek, Libelli, meaning simply "little books," and since the fifth century has been applied to the Sacred Scriptures, the phrase generally used being "Holy Bible." The Jews denominated the Sacred Books as the Writings. In early Anglo-Saxon literature, the term Bibliotheca (the same as in Medieval Latin), was employed in referring to Scriptures, as "the great treasure-house books." This gradually became crystallized in the briefer term Bible (The Book), now generally used throughout the Christian world.

J. R. F., Pittsburg, Pa. I am one of your "Patrons" of the Bowers Mission, and am deeply interested in the result of the work there. Lately I have not seen much mention of the Mission in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Would you kindly inform me how it is progressing? My contribution was sent in two weeks ago.

J. A. E. Pitcher, Long Island City, N. Y. 1. Are Mrs. Palmer's class-meetings that were formerly held at No. 316 East Fifteenth street, New York City, continued yet and at what place? I have been to the old place at Fifteenth street but was told that her meetings, since her death, were stopped at this house. 2. Where can I obtain Mrs. Palmer's book, entitled: The Way to Richness, and the cost?

1. They are now held at 253 East Eighteenth street, the residence of Dr. Miles W. Palmer. 2. You can procure it of Geo. Hughes & Co., Bible House, New York; price, fifty cents.

Remsen, Providence, R. I. What is the legend of the Wandering Jew?

This has already been explained several months ago in THE MAIL-BAG, but for the benefit of others, the story may be briefly retold: One of the fantastic legends of the wandering Jew is that a man spat upon the viour as he passed to Calvary bearing his cross, and the Master mournfully turned toward him and spoke these memorable words: "arry thou till I come." Another is that a baker named Ahasuerus, whose shop is on the road leading from the Judgment Hill to Golgotha, saw the sorrowful procession mingling with Jesus bending under the burden of the Cross. The Saviour was about to place his Cross against the building and rest on the steps, but Ahasuerus drove him away with curses. The legend adds: "As Jesus turned press on, he turned to the shoemaker and mildly said, 'I soon shall cease my journey and this burden aside forever, but thou shalt wander over the earth until I come again.'"

The astonished man shut his shop that day, and began the endless journey which should last until the judgment." Another legend, preserved by the Armenian Church, gives the wanderer's name as Cartaphilus, one of Pilate's door-keepers, who struck Jesus and commanded him to "Go faster."

S. C. T., New Lexington, O. When was the Bible first translated into the Chinese language, and by what denomination of Christians?

The first translation was that prepared by Robert Morrison, a missionary of the London Missionary Society, under whose supervision the entire New Testament was published in 1814, the Old Testament in 1818, and a dictionary in 1823.

R. Altman, Milwaukee, Wis. Some of the statements in Rev. Mr. Greene's book, "The Rule of the Turk," are so startling as to seem incredible. Is he a reliable writer, and possessed of good facilities for information?

Rev. Dr. Greene, himself a missionary, and the son of a missionary to Armenia, has not made a single statement in his book that is not absolutely true. Mr. Gladstone and nearly 100 eminent men here and abroad fully endorse it. Much of it is set down as the result of personal observation, and the rest is drawn from unassailable sources. As a whole, we consider it the best and most accurate presentation of the Armenian question, the atrocities and persecutions of that miserable people that has yet appeared. It has incensed the Turkish government because of its fearless truth-telling. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD some time ago, wishing to lay so Reader, Winnebago Valley, Minn. What is meant by the expression in Luke 6: 35, "And lend, hoping for nothing again?"

The word "lend" here may be interpreted in the sense of "relieve"—to aid, hoping for no return, or if lending, then to abstain from any demand for restitution. The purpose of the passage is to kindle the spirit of Christian helpfulness and benevolence without expectation of reward or return.

M. J., Hudson, N. Y. Can you kindly inform me how many children Roger Williams had and their names? We are direct descendants, but can only trace our own family.

Oscar S. Straus, who wrote his life, mentions six children. The eldest child was Mary, the youngest, Joseph; the eldest son was named Providence. Another son was named Daniel, who had a son named Roger, born May, 1680. Doubtless all the facts relative to his immediate family can be found in the life written by James D. Knowles, and published in Boston, in 1833, or in that written by William Grammel, published in Boston, 1846. They are sure to be found in most public libraries.

"Reader," Kewanee, Ill. 1. Does the great image of Daniel 2 refer to any modern nation? 2. Can the Roman Catholic Church be regarded as a Christian Church?

1. Daniel plainly declares the kingdoms which the various parts of the image typify (Daniel 2: 36-45). They were in the order of Babylon, Medo-Persia, Greece, and Rome. Prophetic expositors generally believe that the ten toes typify a revival of the Roman empire, still in the future, in which ten kings, or Republican Presidents, ruling over the countries which eighteen hundred years ago constituted the Roman Empire, will be joined in a federation, and so reconstitute the Roman Empire, and that it will be overthrown by the kingdom of Christ typified in Daniel by "the stone cut without hands," which will then fill the earth. 2. The title cannot properly be denied it, though it is so corrupt and there is so much of Mariolatry, saint-worship, priestcraft, and reliance on form and ceremony, that the part of Christ in it is infinitesimal. There is enough of Christ in it to keep it alive, like the salt that preserves the carcass.

C. V. P., Camp Point, Ill. Why is this called the nineteenth century when we have not yet reached the year 1900?

It is the nineteenth century. The year 100 completed the first century; the year 1000 began the second century, 2000 the third, and so on until 1801 which was the beginning of the nineteenth.

The following from a well known missionary in Micronesia will interest many readers:

HONOLULU, H. I.

Since reaching these islands a few days ago, I have received from THE CHRISTIAN HERALD two letters, each enclosing drafts, one for two dollars and the other for ten dollars, and I write to say that they have reached me safely, and to thank you and the donors for this help for our work. I am on my way returning to Ruk, after an absence in the home land. There are many dark features in all parts of the Micronesian field, and we greatly need the prayers of all God's people that the Christian converts be more steadfast, that the island of Ponape may be again opened to missionaries, and that God's Spirit may be poured out upon missionaries, native teachers, and the great mass of people who are not yet reached. There are to be some unusual expenses in our mission at Ruk this year, and I doubt not we shall find just the right place to apply this money which you have so kindly sent. Yours in Christian service, MRS. MARY E. LOGAN.

"Inquirer," Brooklyn, N. Y. A Mormon teacher who is here on a mission from Utah is claiming that Mormonism is a higher development of Christianity. Is there any ground for his claim?

No, it is rather a burlesque and degradation of Christianity. Their beliefs that Adam is another name for God; that the Book of Mormon is a revelation from God; that Jesus was a polygamist and other shocking doctrines, are sufficient understood. 2. The meaning is not clear, and several suggestions have been made. The most acceptable is that Christ showed how money might be applied to yield eternal good. In his parable of the judgment (Matt. 25: 31-46) he intimated that the Christian who was careful to relieve the poor would receive a special reward. Thus his words might be paraphrased that those who devoted their wealth (mammon of unrighteousness, the god of the unrighteous) to succoring their needy brethren would find when they died that those whom they helped would be waiting to welcome them to heaven. 3. Simply that his love for God and his temple was the absorbing passion of his being.

"Reader," Norwalk, Conn. If a girl who is a member of a church receives gifts of flowers and other attentions from a married man and writes notes to him, is she not acting dishonorably, and has not the man's wife a right to demand that she vindicate herself?

Possibly if all the circumstances were told impartially, the affair might assume a different complexion from that it wears at first sight. The girl's conduct may have been indiscreet and thoughtless, rather than dishonorable. In any case, the man is chiefly to blame. The wife will be wise in adopting the most charitable view of the circumstances, and may save herself some sorrow and the girl much harm by a kindly and gentle talk with her, which is more likely to promote the good of all concerned than a fierce demand for vindication.

Reader, Deer Isle, Me. If in the resurrection the body is to be free from imperfections, neither maimed nor halt, how are we to account for the wounds which were distinctly perceptible in Christ's body?

The wounds were not imperfections like blindness or lameness. We can imagine that such marks might remain on one of Christ's followers as distinctions if they were inflicted in his service. The new body which God will give at the resurrection will be a spiritual body, and will without doubt be perfect in all its parts. (See I. Cor. 15: 35-44.)

N. B., Kansas City, Pa. 1. Can a candidate for office be a good man if he stands on a bad platform? 2. Please explain I. Cor. 3: 15.

1. Good and bad in a question of this nature are apt to be doubtful terms. If you mean an immoral platform, that is, to be the candidate of a party pledged to do something contrary to the law of God, the answer must be in the negative. But if by bad, you mean detrimental to the public interests, there is some doubt, because the man may honestly believe that the policy which you and others consider bad is really good. 2. That a man who does Christian work from an unworthy motive, or does it in the wrong way must not expect a reward. He just gets into heaven but does not have the commendation—the abundant entrance that a man has who does good and faithful service.

C. Danielson, Evan, Minn. Have we any right to keep the first day of the week as the Sabbath when we know that Christ kept the seventh day? Have we any proof that Christ changed the day?

No proof whatever, and the probability is that he did not change it. Neither is there any proof that we observe the first day as the Sabbath. In fact we do not. The consistent Christian would be miserable on Sunday if he kept it according to Old Testament law. He is not keeping Sabbath (or rest), but spends the day in holy activity, in the Sunday School, or some other occupation in his Lord's service. Nor is there any proof that Christ kept the seventh day as the Sabbath. The only references to his connection with the day are complaints of his breaking it. Cavillers and people who were concerned about the letter of the law, and ignored its spirit, as many do in the present day, were continually finding fault with him for not observing the Sabbath, as some people of similar spirit now find fault with his followers for devoting the first day of the week to his service. If you will turn to Acts 15: 28, 29, you will find what Gentile Christians were required to do. No mention is made there of their keeping the Sabbath and it is expressly stated that no other burden than those mentioned is laid upon them. If you wish, however, to keep the seventh day as a Sabbath, do so by all means. There are specific instructions as to how to observe a Sabbath, and if you need more, any orthodox Jew will furnish you with a list of several hundred things which you must not do if you observe it properly. But do not neglect the Lord's Day, which by the common consent of Christendom, is dedicated to the Lord's service.

Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe.

The Authoress of "Uncle Tom's Cabin" passes away—A Remarkable Christian.

FEW names have been held in greater love and admiration in Christian homes the world over than that of Harriet Beecher Stowe, who died at Hartford, on July 1. For two generations, her literary genius and the deep, womanly sympathy that marked all she wrote, charmed the young and the old. Burdened with the infirmities of age, weakened mentally and physically by prolonged sickness and worn out with an unusual share of domestic troubles, death came as a merciful relief and she passed away as peacefully as a child that goes to sleep secure in the loving care of its Heavenly Father.

Her name is a household word in the homes of America, and the story of her life is one that interests all. Harriet Elizabeth Beecher was born at Litchfield, Conn., in June, 1812, and was the seventh child of Rev. Lyman Beecher and Roxana Foote, his wife. Both parents were possessed of a keen intellectuality and great moral courage and energy, and their daughter inherited these in no small degree. The mother was a woman of rare virtues, finely educated and highly accomplished, and a model helpmeet to the husband, who was a poor and comparatively obscure minister when they were married. The father was one who believed in making his children as happy as possible, and his humor and playfulness at times contrasted strikingly with his intense earnestness and devotion in all things relating to religion. Harriet's childhood was a happy one. She early gave promise of being the most brilliant daughter of a family of famous children.

Rose Terry Cooke, her chosen biographer, gives this pleasing sketch of Mrs. Stowe's childhood:

"The house was on a hill, and the hill in Litchfield from which can be seen still a long stretch of brown stretches of fallow field and rocky upland, here and there a glimmering pond; then, great bright sky, its vast azure expanse swept with fleecy clouds, darkened with the black banners of the thunder, or livid with north-eastern rains. She ran wild among these trees and hills, went nutting into the woods, and gathered the wild berries, fragrant and sweet beyond the giants of to-day, called her into the June-sweet pastures; and in the summer, there was nothing foreign or unknown to her, for the face of the earth about her, and the great mother those

In that crowded parsonage, where the titles of religion reverberated, and all the side of God the Creator and the Governor, which lifts the human soul above the misty passions of earth and gives to its vision the width and clearness

She received the best educational advantages in Boston, and at the Mount Vernon Seminary, her sister, established in 1834 at Boston for young ladies, assisted by Harriet, and under their joint management the school prospered for some years. In 1836,

Harriet married Rev. Calvin E. Stowe, Professor of Biblical Literature in the Lane Theological and Literary Seminary in Cincinnati. Popular feeling ran very high on slavery, and the West became the great battle-ground between the Pro-slavery and Abolitionist parties. The Fugitive Slave Act of 1850 awoke Mrs. Stowe's dormant energies, and inspired her with "a desire to exhibit, in living, dramatic reality," the evils of the system, and in 1850 she wrote and published her celebrated work, "Uncle Tom's Cabin," in the National Era. Much of it—indeed nearly all—was written in the intervals of her family duties. The excitement produced by the book was something unprecedented, for it touched a million hearts. Edition after edition was published, and "Uncle Tom" became familiar in every home throughout the land.

In 1853, she crossed the Atlantic with her husband and was warmly welcomed in England by many distinguished people, including the Duchess of Sutherland, Mr. Sturge, Mr. Charles Dickens, Mr. Cobden, Lord Shaftesbury, Lord Carlisle, and the Duke of Argyle. Although chiefly known as the authoress of "Uncle Tom's Cabin," she wrote other works. Of these, "Dred: A Tale of the Dismal Swamp," is probably the best known. Among her other works are: "The Mayflower," "Agnes of Sorrento," "Town Talk," "Pink and White Tyranny," "Lights and Shadows of New England Life," "The Minister's Wooing," "The Dancing School," "Tales of Truth and Kindness," "Temperance Tales," etc. She always actively aided philanthropic work, and was a most earnest and genial Christian woman.

Toward the close of her life, she became very feeble, both in body and mind, but her Christian faith and beautiful nature at times shone out clearly and unmistakably. On one occasion, at a garden party given in her honor, she said of her own condition: "I am now, in my old age, more interested in the other side of Jordan than this, though life still has its pleasures." The closing years were spent in a quiet rural home in Hartford, Connecticut, cut, where she was tenderly cared for and watched over like a little child. She was a great favorite with a very large circle of friends, and was a welcome visitor in many Hartford homes. Her weak mental condition became more pronounced toward the end. In her death, America loses one of its brightest women, a true Christian, a model wife, and a friend of the poor, the unfortunate and the oppressed.

Mrs. Stowe's literary talent might have availed her little had she not had the habit of industry, which enabled her to make the best use of every spare hour at her disposal. She wrote with her soul in her pen, and her heart running over with human sympathy and kindness. It was the first instance on record where a woman's hand and brain had so deeply impressed the feelings of a nation. Her final resting-place is in the quiet cemetery behind the chapel of the theological seminary at Andover, where her husband and son were buried. There, amid a most beautiful landscape, stands a granite slab and a cross which mark the grave of the author of "Uncle Tom's Cabin."

Childhood in Morocco.

In Morocco, boys are sent to school when five years old. They learn their letters on a thin board, painted white, upon which they are taught to write with a piece of charcoal. They go to school until they are twenty, and are taught the laws of their false religion all through those years, when they in turn become teachers of others. In the country and mountain districts, there is less fanaticism and more freedom, writes Miss Ella C. Baldwin, who has spent several years in Morocco. There the women and girls may go with unveiled faces, but in the towns they are never allowed to go out without being entirely covered with a large veil, or that which can insure and preside over true home, that husband and children up and call blessed?"

Some Time You Shall Know

LAST night, my darling, as you slept I thought I heard you sigh,
And to your little crib I crept,
And watched a space thereby;
And then I stooped and kissed your brow,
For oh, I love you so—
You are too young to know it now,
But some time you shall know!
Some time when, in a darkened place
Where others come to weep,
Your eyes shall look upon a face
Calm in eternal sleep;
The voiceless lips, the wrinkled brow,
The patient smile shall show—
You are too young to know it now,
But some time you may know!

Social Life in Calcutta.

ALTHOUGH the city of Calcutta, India, is in the torrid zone, with intensely hot climate, life there by no means as unbearable as might be imagined. Europeans living there possess a degree of vitality and activity that would seem to contradict the popular idea of the debilitating influence of a tropical climate. A writer in the Indian Museum gives this pleasing description of city in the evening hours: See the hundreds of men driving home in Ralli car looking as fresh as if there were no tropical sun. See the multitudes, thousands, yes, tens of thousands on the maia (common), standing for an hour watching a match of tennis or hockey or football. And the players have forgotten that they are in the torrid zone and that there such a thing as a vertical sun. Men, women and children ride and drive a walk and play as though they enjoy life. The breeze that comes up from the Sunderbans is neither cold nor hot; mai that were an hour earlier on the maia are now in the Ed Gardens; the band playing; little children run and dance and older ones promenade with as much vivacity as in Europe an pleasure resort. The sun was hot noon to-day; and will be perhaps a little hotter to-morrow. But there is a wonderful quality in the moisture-laden air that comes up from the sea which, when mixed with the dry heat of a vertical sun in a cloudless sky, furnishes an atmosphere in which it is positive joy to live.

Moonlight Evenings

In these beautiful summer moonlight nights, nature is so attractive that most people are fain to linger outdoors. In an article in the Ladies' Home Journal, Alder W. Quinby tells us something of the real character of moonlight. An examination of it with the spectroscope shows the same spectrum as that of sunlight. It would take six hundred and eighteen thousand full moons to supply to us an amount of light equal to that which we get from the sun, and there is only sky room for, say, seventy-five thousand of them. Some heat comes from the moon, but very little. The inclination of the moon's orbit to accounts for the "harvest" and the "hunter's" moons, which occur when the tipping is slightest, thus permitting the moon to rise about the same time for several successive evenings. The moon often appears much enlarged when on the horizon, but this is caused by refraction.

A Child's Petition.

Dear Father, whom I cannot see,
Smile down from heaven on little me;
Let angels through the darkness spread
Their holy wings about my bed.
And keep me safe, because I am
The heavenly Shepherd's little lamb,
Dear God, our Father, watch and keep
Father and mother while they sleep.

MRS. STOWE'S RESIDENCE IN HARTFORD.

THE QUIET COUNTRY HOME WHERE SHE SPENT HER CLOSING YEARS.

"haik," and must not have but one eye exposed to view. If at fourteen years of age the girl is unmarried, she is sold by her father or brother in exchange for sheep, goats, camels, or mules—usually to the value of about one hundred and fifty dollars. Henceforth she becomes the slave and drudge of the man who buys her, and is ever made to feel herself his inferior.

Home and its Mistress.

Before all other things in our ordinary lives, writes Mrs. Beecher, there should come first the idea of home. No matter how high your ambition may transcend its duties, no matter how far your talents or your influence may reach beyond its doors, before everything else build up a true home. Be not its slave; be its minister! Let it not be enough that it is sweet and garnished, that its silver is brilliant, that its food is delicious, but feed the love in it, feed the truth in it, feed thought and aspiration, feed all charity and gentleness in it. What is the ability to speak from a public platform to large, intelligent audiences, or wisdom that may command a seat on the judge's bench, compared to Claiming the Promises.

Instructions on the Christian Endeavor
Time for the Week Beginning July 26.
Leah 40: 25-31.

ONE of the most cogent evidences of the Divine origin of the Scriptures is their suitability to every age and every condition of life. They speak to the deepest needs of humanity which are the same in all times. The contrast between the conditions of our life in this busy, eager, nervous nineteenth century, and those of the times in which the books of the Bible were written could not be greater than it is; yet our turn, like our fathers' and our ancestors', turns to the sacred Book and find comfort and encouragement in its promises. Out of the skies the Divine authority utters its promises. There is no circumstance, no crisis in human life that has not been foretold and a special message set forth to help the man in his emergency.

The variety of these promises is never fully realized. We read the promise and there is no sound in our nature for that special boon and it passes us by without leaving any special mark; but our neighbor, the one associated with us in business, or sitting beside us in sorrow, may be clinging to that promise with the might of his hand and risking all his hopes on it. And by-and-by our circumstances may change and a new value may come to the forgotten promise and it may seize it to help us in our need. Thus there are promises for the young, for the mature, for the aged. Promises to the rich and the poor, for the happy and the sorrowful, for him who rejoices and him who mourns, for the widow at the fatherless, and for men in every variety of spiritual experience. When the need drives to the promise awaits us.

We are not sufficiently practical about these promises. The promise of a parent or a friend counts with us and we build up on it, but the promise of God we treat with doubt and hesitancy. Take, as a specimen, the promise that he who believeth shall have eternal life. How many who know the promise and know that they believe, are yet in doubt and darkness! Innumerable promises of spiritual blessings are treated in the same manner. It is not that we doubt God's ability to his Word, or his ability to keep his Word, but that in some way we doubt if he means what he has said. We do not receive his promise as we would a human promise, which has infinitely less reason behind it to inspire us with confidence.

This manifestation of faith is an essential condition attaching to many of the promises. It is to him that believeth that things are possible. To receive the promise and plead it with perfect confidence in its fulfillment, is an achievement possible with few. There is an idea that urgency and repetition are necessary and that God needs to be urged to do as he has said. The parable of the Unjust Judge is often quoted as confirming this practice. Yet it sustains the opposite view. It is true that God takes his own mode and time for the fulfillment of his promise, but the faith that he expects from us has no element of persistent urging in it. It is the faith that is satisfied that the promise is sure and that though in his wisdom God may delay the answer, it will come when he sees that the right time has come. Such a faith is a sure source of happiness. The believer rests on the promise assured that in the end it cannot fail.

The Last Hour.

IF I were told that I must die to-morrow.
That the next sun
Which sinks should bear me past all fear and sorrow
For any one.
All the night fought, all the short journey through.
What should I do?
What could I do, O blessed Guide and Master,
Other than this:
Still to go on as now, not slower, faster,
Nor fear to miss
The road, although so very long it be,
While led by thee?
Step after step, feeling thee close beside me,
Although unseen,

Through thorns, through flowers, whether the tempest hide thee,
Or heaven serene.
Assured thy faithfulness cannot betray
Thy love decay.
I may not know, my God, no hand revealeth
Thy counsels wise:
Along the path a deepening shadow stealeth.
No voice replies
To all my questioning thought, the time to tell.
And it is well.
Let me keep on, abiding and untearing
Thy will always.
Through a long century's ripening fruition,
Or a short day's:
Thou canst not come too soon: and I can wait,
If thou come late.

The Closing Dispensation.

Signs in Government, in Society, and in the Church that the Dispensation is Ending.
BY REV. H. GRATTAN GUINNESS, D.D.

THE 1,260 years of the principal power of the Mohammedan Anticrist, and of the simultaneous treading down of the holy city, Jerusalem (Rev. 11: 2), reckoned from the Saracenic capture of Jerusalem and the subjugation of Palestine in A. D. 637, will terminate in the year 1897; and present events indicate that we are on the eve of the break-up of the Mohammedan power in the East. The terrible Armenian massacres will probably bring about a further and much more extensive disintegration of Turkish dominion; if not its total extinction. It may be noted that 2,300 years lunar form extend from B. C. 336, the initial date of Alexander's conquests (prominent in the prophecy of the ram and he-goat—Dan. 8), to A. D. 1897, the date of the expiration of the 1,260 solar years from the setting up of Saracenic rule in Palestine. Among all the signs of the nearness of "the end of the age," none, perhaps, are more important than those connected with the state of the Jewish people. The removal of Jewish disabilities, and coincident rise of Jewish wealth, learning, and social and political influence; the unification of the Jews by various alliances, especially the Universal Israelite Alliance, which has countless branches in the present day all over the world; the persecution of the Jews on the Continent, and particularly in Russia, where they are so numerous; and the constant growth of a national desire on the part of the Jewish people to return to the land of their fathers—all point to the proximity of the close of the "times of the Gentiles," which are throughout times of the depression and dispersion of the Jews.

The present widespread preaching of the Gospel as a witness to all nations is a further sign of the nearness of the end. To these signs it is important to add those which arise from the remarkable but much overlooked analogy of the Jewish and Christian dispensations, recognized in the foreviews of prophecy.

The Pharisees, Sadducees, and Herodians of the close of the Jewish dispensation have their counterparts in the present day. It is not too much to say that the fatal rejection of Christ which marked the termination of Jewish national history is being repeated on a wider scale in modern scepticism; while the cry, "Where is the promise of his coming?" and the the boast that all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation, are foretold features of "the last days," and proclaim to those who have eyes to see, and ears to hear, that the advent of the Lord as a thief in the night is now indeed at hand.

"The Lord himself (1. Thess. 4), shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel," and swift as a lightning-flash, shall take place the Resurrection, the Transfiguration, and the Rapture of the Church! Assembled from earth to heaven, united, perfected, glorified, the saints shall meet the Lord in the air, and enter with him on the new life and triumphant joys and occupations of eternity. Satan shall be cast out and his dominion abolished. The saints shall judge the world and administer with Christ the affairs of his kingdom over the nations.

A PRINCESS IN CALICO,

CHAPTER XII.

Light at last.

RICHARD EVERIDGE sat in his handsome library one evening in early summer, reading a letter from his only child, Muriel, the joy of his heart:

"MY DEAREST PAPA:—We are stopping now in the quaintest little place, a veritable Sleepy Hollow, like its name, where Rip Van Winkle might have snoozed away for centuries without fear of being disturbed.

"As I told you in my last, we were on our way to Framingham, when something went wrong with the engine, and we had to stop here for repairs, and Mamma was so charmed with this little village that she decided to stay awhile; she says it seems to suit her better than any place she has seen; poor mamma, I wish she could find some place where she would be satisfied. To me, all the world seems so beautiful, but she says no one knows how to sympathize with her peculiar organization.

"That was Saturday. On Sunday morning I went to the little church; mamma was too tired, and now comes the best part of the story. I was looking round, watching the different families, all in their Sunday best, coming in and getting seated, when suddenly a woman's voice began to lead the little choir. I looked up with a start. She was tall and slender, and as she stood with lifted head, singing her heart out, I don't think I ever saw such a splendid carriage, even at the President's receptions in Washington. She looked like a princess among the plain, farmer folk; for a crown she had a mass of lovely soft, white hair, and the sweetest, clearest eyes I ever saw. When she was singing, 'Coronation,' which was quite appropriate for a princess, it seemed as if she would lift the whole congregation up to God.

"After the service I could not help watching her, for as you will have imagined ere this, my silly heart went out to her at once. She was the centre of a group, every one seemed to have something to say to her, and she was so nice with them all, kissing the children and having a bright smile and word for some of the most uninteresting women and stupid-looking boys I ever saw. Just as I was going out of the door, I felt a soft touch upon my arm and turned to find her beside me. I am free to confess I never received such a welcome to any church before.

"When I gave her my name she looked puzzled for a minute.

"'Everidge,' she repeated. 'It is, it must be, she would be just about your age. I believe you are the little Muriel that my Cousin Belle used to write about. You must come home with me at once. Your father was my dear friend in the long ago.' 'And so here we are ensconced with my Princess. She has a wonderful way with her, for mamma came without making the slightest objection and seems happier than I have seen her for months.

"There are just four in the family beside Martha Spriggs, the funny old girl. My Princess, and her two stepbrothers, Stephen and Lemuel, and Polly, who has been a sufferer from spinal trouble all her life. It is the quaintest old house, with low, small rooms, except on the east side where Captain Lemuel has added two large rooms with the newest bay window, which are always full of flowers and sunshine. I think the neighbors are horrified at the place, and that the old ladies have done up in must and green paper, but the Princess says, 'Nothing is too good for Polly and the boys.' They just idolize her, and I think they are right. As for as Stephen said in his queer, blunt way, 'She comes as near to an angel as any mortal ever will.' Captain Lemuel has been all over the world and is very interesting. Mamma is so amused over his stories; Stephen is blunt, but I shouldn't be afraid to trust him with every cent I owned, and Polly is just a bundle of sweetness and patience. I wish you could see how gentle these great strong men are with her—Stephen won't let anyone but himself carry her to bed, and Lemuel is always ready to push her about in her wheel chair and talk nonsense to her till she laughs and cries together.

"And the Princess! She is just everything to everybody. I cannot fancy what the house would be without her. I only hope she won't die before Polly, for I'm sure it would kill her. She never takes her eyes off her when she is in the room, and when I teased her a little about it, her eyes filled and she cried softly.

"It's little wonder if I do love her, after thirty years of such nursing as no one even dreamed of! It made me almost wish to be sick myself.

"She has such a merry, tender way with her. I don't wonder Lemuel says they don't mind rainy weather since Pauline makes sunshine to order. And she is the busiest creature! I believe she carries the whole of Sleepy Hollow on her heart and shoulders. She seems to have all the destitute and afflicted under her wing, and dispenses beef tea and Bible promises with the same liberal hand.

"Oh! Papa, I am so glad we were detained at Sleepy Hollow, for at last I have found what I have been looking for—an absolutely Christian life! Your own little daughter, MURIEL."

Richard Everidge remained sunk in thought for a long time after he had kissed the large, girlish signature, then he drew a sheet of paper towards him, and wrote in his clear, bold hand,

"MY DARLING MURIEL:—I knew your Princess, as she says in 'the long ago,' and she is, as you have found her, pure gold. 'Make the most of your visit, for, next to your Bible, she is the best teacher you could have. Your loving father."

The days lengthened into weeks and the Everidges were still at the Farm.

"Why should you go?" Pauline said in her cheery, unanswerable way, when they spoke of leaving; "it does us good to have you, and it does you good to be here," and Muriel and her mother were content.

They saw much of the Princess, as Muriel called her, during their stay, but the impression the first acquaintances made on the girl increased rather than diminished. She looked at her sometimes in wonder at the perfection of her patience, and again in loving admiration as she witnessed some act of kindness or compassion. The two drew very near in those days of companionship. Muriel had her father's high spiritual nature and had imbibed his conceptions of grandeur of character. She had seen him living out his ideal and had revered him with filial affection. But his was a man's life, much of which was necessarily incomprehensible to the girl. In Pauline she saw a life she could more easily understand, and her feminine nature realized its difficulties and admired the spirit that overcame them.

Muriel accompanied Pauline in her visits in the village, and followed her about the house in her domestic duties. The girl was as eager to learn, as the tender, gentle woman was to impart the lessons of life. It was education in the highest sense, which is not restricted to the acquisition of knowledge. The fact is often forgotten in the training of children. Pauline had learned by hard experience the value of high and pure principles. The bitterness, the sadness, the depressing monotony of her life had all done their work upon her, not in souring her, or crushing out the elasticity of her youthful spirit, but in developing the forces which draw strength from the depths of inexhaustible fulness. As the wind and the storm and the drought compel the tree to spread its roots to the hidden moisture, her nature had reached out for the grace of God.

Long conversations there were between the saintly woman and the girl in the early morning hours while the work about the farm was in progress, and Muriel could have her mentor to herself as she could not in the evening when the grave Stephen and the sprightly Captain Lemuel were on hand, and Mrs. Everidge and Polly joined in the talk. There could be no confidences then, but in the morning hours the girl could unburden herself and seek light on the problems that present themselves so perplexingly on the threshold of life. Muriel treasured the sweet encouraging words that were spoken to her so lovingly and wisely, with the tender sympathy of one who knew the cravings of the young nature, and had learned the secret of controlling them.

One morning they were together thus in the old kitchen, not now gloomy and poverty-stricken, but bright with tasteful touches that marked the presence of a cultured woman. Pauline was busy over a preserving kettle and Muriel was watching her and asking her questions about the household mysteries that were to issue in well-filled jars of preserved fruits. Both were startled by a hurried step outside and the entrance of a big boy, panting and bare-headed.

"Please, Ma'am," he said deferentially as Pauline looked up inquiringly; "Father's been run over and he's hurted dreadful and they've brought him over, and the doctor ain't come, and mother wants you to come if you can." The words poured out in a continuous stream, punctuated only by his hard breathing.

"Run back," said Pauline, "and tell your mother I'll come right away."

The boy ran away, and Pauline, putting aside her work and making a few rapid changes in her attire, set out at once.

"May I not go with you?" Muriel asked beseechingly.

Pauline hesitated a moment. "They will be in sad distress," she said, "I do not think you will like to be there, but come if you wish. It may be well for you to see real sorrow, that you may learn to sympathize."

"Do these interruptions to your work never make you impatient?" the girl asked as they hurried through the fields by a short cut to the main road.

"I remember the time when they did," Pauline answered. "I had to say over to myself, 'not to be ministered unto, but to minister.' The law of the kingdom, you know. We, who want to be the loyal servants to the King, must know his laws and obey them. One needs to have them well in memory, and this one especially. The flesh does not obey them of its own accord. It becomes easy after a time, but at first the reminder is necessary. I am not distressed now. I am ready for service when there is opportunity. It is the thing I am here for."

They were soon among the afflicted family, and Muriel noticed how Pauline's very presence produced a tranquilizing effect. The agitated wife ceased to lament and wring her hands helplessly, and went hither and thither collecting such articles as Pauline thought might be needed by the doctor.

"I am glad to see you here," said that worthy, on his arrival, shaking hands with Pauline. "I shall have some one now capable of receiving instructions. These people would forget one-half."

Pauline went with him into the chamber where the injured man lay hovering between life and death, his trembling wife clinging convulsively to her hand.

Muriel waited with the frightened children in the outer room, doing her best to soothe them. The shadow was too dark to be lifted, but her kindly sympathy seemed to make them feel less lonely and forlorn.

Presently, Pauline came out with the Doctor. "It was all over," in the phrase of the country. The curtain had fallen on the tragedy and the wife was a widow and the children fatherless. The woman could be heard weeping hysterically in the chamber of death.

"I must stay here awhile," she said to Muriel. "You had better not wait. Tell Polly how I am detained," and with a kiss she sent the child on her errand and turned to give such comfort as she could to the bereaved family.

Many a time in the years that were past, had such a task fallen to her lot. Every family in the village knew that could be counted on to give consolation and help in time of trouble. She was loved by one and all in the whole village, there was none who would have a large blank if she were called away. So much had her discipline done for her. So blessed to others beside herself, that decision been when she gave her life to the King.

"Princess," said the girl one day, watching her moving lightly about the kitchen, "I envy you your altitude."

Pauline laughed merrily.

"You dear child! Everyone gets up the mountain if they keep on climbing."

"But I have not an atom of persistence," sighed Muriel, "Christianity is such a tremendous undertaking to me."

"Let me give you what was to me the beginning of all Gospels. 'The kingdom of heaven is just as near us as our work for the gate of heaven for each soul in the endeavor to do that work perfect'."

"But, Princess, you are such a creature. It seems such a waste for me to be buried here."

"The King never wastes, little one. If we have the angel aim and standard, we can consecrate the smallest acts. I know that he who aims for perfection in a trifle, is trying to do that holily!"

"You dear Princess! You make me think of one of Murillo's pictures in the Louvre which we saw when we were abroad year. It is the interior of a Convent kitchen, and instead of mortals in old dress doing the work there are beautiful winged angels. One puts the kettle on the fire and one is lifting up a pail of water and one is at the kitchen dresser reaching up for plates."

Pauline smiled.

"That's it exactly. How can any of us do common when we remember inheritance? You call me Princess of love, little one, but I am a Princess in ality, for my Father is a King. Let me give you a good word which your father gave me long ago. 'If you cannot realize your ideal, you can at least idealize it. Real.' I have been trying to do it since."

"That is just like Papa," said Muriel with a proud smile. "He says you are pure gold," Princess.

"Did Rich—did your father say that?" cried Pauline, and Muriel looked up to a soft flush in her face, while her eyes shone—"The King's daughter is all glorious within," she repeated slowly. "clothing is of wrought gold." Then she chanted in her clear triumphant voice,

They have clean robes,

White robes—

White robes are waiting for me!

"Ah! little one, the 'Court dress' heaven differs somewhat from that earth!"

"But, Princess," said Muriel, wistful "farm work and cooking and wash dishes over and over—it seems such drudgery."

A great light broke over her face, and she cried in a low exultant tone,

"Blessed be Drudgery!" Christ be it for thirty years, why should I mind fifty-three? I have only to wait a little now for the 'fulness of joy' and 'pleasure forevermore.'"

Muriel threw her arms about her and kissed her softly.

"Then our Princess will be at home she whispered, 'in the Palace of the King' bowing in the woods, and refused to be comforted till it was explained to them that it was only "a cow's baby crying for its mamma."

Many of the children come with queer ideas of the country. One little boy asked: "Are those your chickens?" He was told "No, they are the neighbors." "The neighbors!" he said; "why I thought they don't have any neighbors in the country."

To chronicle the quaint doings of our little guests at Mont-Lawn for a single day would fill many columns. Dr. Klopsch, to raise the spirit of emulation among the children, and to establish a standard of behavior, has devised a simple system which has produced excellent results. A ticket has been printed:

Christian Herald's Children's Home.

FOR GOOD DEPARTMENT.

Even a child is known by his doings."

Proverbs 20: 14.

A child is well behaved, it receives one of these tickets daily during its ten days' stay at the Home. When it has ten tickets and is ready to leave Mont-Lawn, it presents the tickets and receives in return a New Testament, or some other suitable book. Each child who is well behaved also receives a handsome badge, either of blue, crimson, yellow, maroon silk, and is pinned in gilt like that shown below:

The wearers display their badges pinned on the front of their coats or dresses, and they are evidence that they are orderly and decorous children. The badges, however, have another purpose as well, and to the minds of the wearers a very important one—they entitle the wearers to share in all the sports that are going on, and this privilege is accorded to them as long as they wear them, which is just as long as they behave properly.

A child who displays the badge can join in quits, marbles, "jacks," and a dozen other games indoors or out; can "take a swim" in the new bathing tank, and can always find some amusement, that will make the hours glide past swiftly. If by misbehavior he either forfeits or fails to secure a badge, he is debarred from all those recreations. This of course as may be imagined, is sufficient to induce even the rudest to try to behave.

There has already been a marked improvement. To the caretakers, the little folks are obedient and polite; they are better behaved toward one another than before; they are quieter at times when quiet is essential and at bed-time, rather than fretting for their badges, and all the joys they secure the youngsters go noiselessly to their little white pillows after prayers have been said, and are soon fast asleep, dreaming probably of the frolics of the day to come.

The Fourth of July has furnished a topic for the children for many days. I had a most glorious time of it. They still talk of the marching and the races—the division according to size—thirteen companies of boys and thirteen of girls, with six children in each division, and all racing in their turn and the lucky winners each receiving a prize. Then there were the swiss and see-saws, and rope jumping, and the wonderful street organ all day long and fine fireworks at night. Only one accident occurred—a little fellow tumbled from an apple tree, breaking two teeth and cutting his under lip, but the doctor soon had him right again.

Armenia's Desperate Plight.

Turks and Kurds Seizing the Lands Once Occupied by Christians.

ONE by one, the promises made by the Sultan's Government of "reforms" for Armenia are proving worthless. Letters received last week from missionaries of the American Board, who have been engaged in the relief work, tell a sad story of the hopeless condition of the persecuted Armenians, who have been spared in the massacres only to face lives of lingering misery. A missionary writes from Harpoot as follows:

"We have kept the Armenian sufferers alive through the winter. Had it not been for the aid you sent thousands must have perished. But what touches me now, more than the actual destitution, is the hopelessness of their situation unless some permanent relief can be given them. Especially cattle are needed. The plowing for the fall sowing must be done now, while the moisture is in the ground. In the Village of Ashvan I found that Turks and Kurds were coming in from neighboring villages and plowing the lands. Some of them took the lands by force, some take them from the landlords, who give the lands to those who have cattle to work them. If the Christians lose their holdings, it will be only a question of time when they will have to give their houses also over to Turks and Kurds, and take to the cities, where they will live on charity or die.

"In the Charsandjak region Christians are being ejected wholesale by the landlords.

"As I passed through a village the other day the whole village came out to the road and stood there weeping and crying, 'We are hungry, we are hungry,' as we rode on. Their cry haunts me. I have sent them a little relief to put off the day of starvation; but their lands lie fallow, their houses are in ruins and no hand is stretched out to lift them up and set them on their feet. What is the end to be?"

Another missionary writes: "We tried to incite the people to go to work and rebuild their homes, but we were met by the word which is more current than any other word in this land: Fear! 'Fear and Hopelessness,' sum up their situation. They say 'we are afraid to do anything lest we should be attacked again.' A Turkish bey said to the Christians: 'I told you last fall what would happen, and you did not believe me. Now you are beginning to work in your fields, but I tell you your labor will be in vain.'

"From all quarters come the same stories. The Christians feel that there is no security for them and they have no heart to put their hands to the work. I said to them: 'What will you do next winter, if you do not provide some shelter for yourselves during the summer?' They replied, 'We shall die.' 'We have sold everything that was left to us. Our resources are gone.' Even in villages near Harpoot no effort is being made to rebuild their houses. They say, 'If no help comes to us we will try to flee from the country.' Our relief so far has been simply to keep the people alive.

"In the village of Kopey—once about 150 houses, of which only 15 remain—in some houses there was a little bread, in all there were little bunches of grass which is now their principal food. The faces of the women and children were emaciated and yellow. I asked one little boy if he had eaten a piece of bread that day, and he replied, 'No; he had eaten only grass.' Other children said they had eaten a piece of bread as large as my hand. When we sat down on the ground, surrounded by most of the villagers, some of the children were all the time pulling up grass and eating it roots and all. So far as I can judge there are only a few days between the people of this village and starvation. I hope to be able to help them before they reach that point. I am buying grain to take there and distribute.

"The appeals from Arabkir, Palu and Perl are urgent."

"Consider the Lilies."

HE hides within the lily
A strong and tender care,
That wins the earth-born atoms
To glory of the air;
He weaves the shining garments
Unceasingly and still,
Along the quiet waters,
In niches of the hill.

We linger at the vigil
With him who bent the knee,
To watch the old-time lilies
In distant Galilee;
And still the worship deepens
And quickens into new,
As brightening down the ages
God's secret thrilleth through.

O Toiler of the lily,
Thy touch is in the man!
No leaf that dawns to petal
But hints the angel plan.
The flower horizons open!
The blossom vaster shows!
We hear the wide-world's echo,
See how the lily grows.

Shy yearnings of the savage,
Unfolding thought by thought,
To holy lives are lifted,
To visions fair are wrought,
The races rise and cluster,
Transfigurations fall,
Man's chaos blooms to beauty,
Thy purpose crowning all!

THE BOOK SHELF

NONE who are acquainted with the history of Luther need to be told that he did not start upon his career as a Reformer, either from the point of view of a theological critic, or as an assailant of the authority of the Church or of the Pope. His simple motive was to put an end to certain practical abuses which, as he deeply felt, were working dire mischief both to religion and morality. The development of new theological opinions in his mind was closely connected with the progress of his religious experience. It kept pace with his gradual deliverance from the thrall of fear and the attainment of freedom and peace, through the clear perception of the distinction between law and Gospel. In the cloister he had been a student of Augustine, and of Occam, D'Ailly, and other nominalistic Schoolmen. He was affected by Mystics, who partook of the spirit of St. Bernard, and by such writings as the sermons of Tauler, and that devout little treatise, which he edited in 1516, the "German Theology." But his strong, ethical feeling, his vivid sense of personality in God and man, and of personal responsibility, kept him from embracing Mysticism in its peculiar character as a system of devotion. It is possible to trace the progress of Luther's mind, step by step, from the year 1513, until he reached a distinct perception and firm grasp of the doctrine that salvation, from beginning to end, is an absolute free gift of God's grace. The vestiges of a notion of merit, which was inherited from Augustine and the Schoolmen, ceased at length to mingle in his enunciation of this profound conviction. As early as 1516, he propounds the statement that faith is our inward righteousness; that yet it is the gift of God, and the source, not the consequence, of good works. But utterances like these were simply a reflex of his religious life; they were not set forth in the way of opposition to the reigning orthodoxy. In 1517, in the 95 Theses, he affirmed that the Pope can remit no penalties which he has not the power to impose; that he has no more power in relation to purgatory than any other bishop, or even any other curate has within his own precinct; that true contrition seeks and loves punishment; that the true treasure of the Church is the Holy Gospel of the glory and grace of God. "At that time, so far was he from any thought of breaking with the Church or rebelling against Rome, that he describes himself as having been then a monk and a mad Papist." Inconsistent expressions respecting the Pope and his authority, signs of a vacillation of feeling on this topic, which continued for a considerable period, indicate not insincerity, but simply that he was feeling his way on a dimly lighted path. He tells us that he was of the number of whom Augustine said that he was one, who advance gradually, by writing and teaching. The Disputation at Leipsic, in July, 1519, was the occasion of calling out from him the avowal of a conviction to which he had now arrived, that the Church could exist without a Pope—a fact, he said, of which the Church of Christ has no example; and that not even a General Council is infallible. It was during the last half of the year 1520 that there were issued from his pen three publications of great historic significance, both from the effect produced by them and as exhibiting his now ripened beliefs. In his Address to the German Noblesse, he struck a blow at the root of the entire hierarchial system by declaring that the priest is not distinguished from the layman, save that the priest exercises, at the bidding of the Church as its representative, a ministerial office. All disciples are priests. If an exigency should exist where consecration of bishops could not be obtained, it might be dispensed with. The choice of the brethren would be sufficient.

At the Towers of Silence.*

ONE of the principal peculiarities of the Parsee religion is the disposition which they make of their dead. We visited the Dakhamas, or Towers of Silence, on Malabar Hill, where their dead are carried, to be devoured by the vultures. The drive to this place was delightful, the nearer approach to the garden being by a private way, which none but Parsees are allowed to travel without special permit.

At the end of the road we were obliged to leave our carriage, and our cameras as well; for the gatekeeper disappointed me by hurriedly seizing my tripod, and then rushing after my friend Dr. Mabie,—with whom we visited the hill,—and victoriously capturing his kodak. So we proceeded without them, up stone steps, by a way very changing in direction. At the top is a chapel, or house of prayer, where a fire of sandal-wood and incense is kept continually burning. This we were not allowed to enter. All the way by which we came were flowers, shrubs, and tropical trees in rich profusion; and from the top of the hill to the sea the same beautiful decorations slipped down in gorgeous parterres, and seemed to blend with that flood of water that stretches into the sunset. Behind us was Bombay, the harbor, and the range of receding ghats.

There are five towers, all white. The oldest has been built two hundred and fifteen years, and the others one hundred and forty-five, one hundred, sixty, and forty-five years respectively. They are round, about fifteen feet high, and of different sizes, the largest being ninety feet in diameter. The inside of these buildings are open to the sky; in the centre is a well which receives the bones after they have been acted upon by sun and rain. About this are three circles of receptacles for the bodies of the dead,—the inner one for children, with tender bones; the next for women; while the outer circle is for men, with harder bones. Upon one side is an iron door, approached by an inclined walk; through this door the dead are pushed, and left for the vultures to devour.

Flocks of these ugly, repulsive-looking birds sat upon the towers, and swept on logy wing over the garden, while, out in a palm tree overlooking the private way, an old sentinel sat to notify his fellows of the coming of a funeral train. When the gates are opened for the funeral procession none know it any sooner than the vulture.

We had seen the natives in their humble homes, on their farms, in their places of business, in their schools, and in their temples. We had seen their temples and their gods, all demoralizing and harmful, with no good thing about them. We had seen them making long pilgrimages, and gaining no satisfaction. Beside the way we had seen many a skull and skeleton, where a man or a woman had fallen down and died alone; while the cattle, when they became old or sick, were comfortably laid out on the banks of the river, and a man or a woman would sit by the side of the dead, and sing a dirge, and then the dead would be carried to the towers of silence.

It is wonderful how Hood's Sarsaparilla freshens and invigorates the tired body. It creates an appetite, and makes the blood pure. It is a wonderful medicine, and is now available to all who are suffering from these troubles.

housed in hospitals. We had heard about the terrible self-torture for conscience' sake, and of the child-marriages, which are enough to crush out any people's life.

Armenia's Greatest Hero.*

VARTAN Mamigonian is the most esteemed and beloved name in Armenian history. Tiridates founded the Christian kingdom; but when the religion was in danger of extermination throughout Persian Armenia at the hands of the fire-worshippers, Vartan saved it, and died for it, a faithful servant of God and his Saviour. It was said of him that he was an honest, modest, wise, brave, true, pure, childlike, and Christ-like Christian commander, a great soldier of the Cross. He was a lamb in nature, but when he came to defend his religion he was a lion.

In 439 Yazdegerd II. of Persia succeeded his father, Bahram V., the destroyer of the Arsacid dynasty, and began a furious persecution of both Jews and Christians, which lasted a dozen years, and ended in a complete victory for religious freedom. The king, like James I. of England, fancied himself a great theologian, he could always be victorious in a debate by killing his opponent. One specimen will suffice. He called a convocation of Armenian priests and noblemen, and commanded them to embrace fire-worship on pain of death. "Your Christ cannot save you," said he, "for he is crucified and dead." "Oh, my gracious king," replied a young nobleman, "why did you not read further about Christ? He was indeed crucified, but rose again, ascended to heaven, and is living now and our Saviour." The king in a rage had his head struck off.

Finally, in 450 the people of Persian Armenia rose in revolt, and determined to fight for their religion. Vartan took command of them, and showed himself the ablest commander of his time. For a year he held at bay the overwhelming forces of the Persian Empire, and was victorious in every battle, even to the last. Finally the forces were arrayed for battle on the banks of the Dughmood river, in the plains of Avarayr, near the present city of Van. Vartan had 66,000 men, the Persians several times as many. Vartan prayed to God for help, and to Christ for his own salvation; then he made a speech, and with his troops, he crossed the river, fell on the enemy's centre, and scattered the huge army in rout, killing 3,544 men besides nine great princes and losing 1,036 of his own; but, alas! one of these was himself, dying from a mortal wound not long after. Yazdegerd saw it was impossible to conquer the Armenians, and granted entire liberty to the Christians.

DEAR MR. CONGREVE.—As a rule I have no faith in advertised remedies; but it must now be some twenty-five years since I saw in the person of one of my students the effects of your Balsamic Elixir. He seemed at death's door, but he lives now, a strong, hearty man. Since then I have seen in many, very many instances, the most happy results following your medicine. I do not go by hearsay, but I testify to what I have seen with my own eyes. I believe that you have saved numbers from Consumption. I have friends with coughs and weak lungs, who speak of your medicine with sincere gratitude. Personally I find it most useful in the case of wearing cough. Very reluctantly do I give testimonials for publication; but I send you this as your due. What I have seen of God's healing power through you demands of me that I speak for the good of others. I have those around me whose health I value, and they are living witnesses that yours is a very beneficial preparation. Yours heartily,

Spurgeon.

INDIA'S HEATHEN TRIBES.

Lepchas, Demon-Worshippers of the Hills, and their Strange Beliefs—Through All the Ages, Christ Unknown Among them Till Now.

A VERY range of mountains and every extensive forest in India is peopled by a remnant of one of the original races of India, who were driven into the mountains and forests when the Hindoos came to the country, about 1,000 B. C. Those tribes differ altogether among themselves in appearance, language and customs; but they are all different from the Hindoos, in being illiterate, savage, and fetish-worshippers. I have been among a number of tribes, but there are many more I have not seen.

In the southern slope of the Himalayas, in the northeastern corner of India, is a small independent State, called Sikkim, of some 1500 square miles in extent, inhabited by not more than 7000 people.

The inhabitants are called Lepchas, an aboriginal tribe who, although weak in physique and gentle in spirit, preserved their independence when the mountains to the south and west of them were overrun by Hindoos and the mountains to the north and east by Mongols. To this day they speak their own language, wear their own dress, and follow their own religion, greatly despised by the Hindoo and Buddhist neighbors. Their religion is demon-worship, without idols or doctrines, and their priests are ignorant sorcerers.

Sikkim lies exactly between British India and the inaccessible country of Tibet, and close to its northern border is the fashionable mountain resort of Darjeeling where the seat of the British Government of Bengal is moved every summer from the scorching heat of Calcutta. The mountains for miles around Darjeeling are occupied by British tea-planters who have converted

The British Government has long been desirous of civilizing the Lepchas and raising them to be an intelligent and progressive people. For this reason the missionaries who work among them in British territory—for the Lepcha king is too much under the influence of Tibet to allow foreigners to enter his country freely—are cordially helped by the government officials and encouraged to open schools in the Lepcha villages near Darjeeling. Between twenty and thirty miles from Darjeeling is a place called Kalimpong, where a great fair is held once a year, and in developing that fair, which would be a miserable thing but for this encouragement, officers, planters, and missionaries co-operate with great energy. Hindoos from the plains, Nepalese from the west, Bhootas, or Bhootanese, from the east, and Lepchas and Tibetans from the north, flock into Kalimpong with wares of all sorts to sell. The Tibetans bring wool and ponies, the others bring curious manufactures, and the poor Lepchas come with honey, Military displays, bands of music, and magic lantern exhibitions show the strangers what the English can do, and the strangers, on their part, display the dances and amusements of their country.

One of the illustrations accompanying this article shows a band of dancers in masks, and the writer, who saw them dancing, will never forget the horrid spectacle. The missionaries who work among the Lepchas are Presbyterians of the Established Church of Scotland, and this particular Mission is maintained by a Young

Mr. Aitken, the writer of the foregoing interesting letter, is the son of a famous Scottish missionary, who was in India during the mutiny of 1857. One of the son's earliest recollections is of his father and mother setting his brother and himself on the flat roof of the house in which they lived to keep a lookout lest the rebels should fire the building while they worn-out parents slept. The boys watched by turns for an hour at a time, and were ready to awake the sleepers at a moment's notice, should the incendiary parties of natives come near.

Mr. Aitken has been a great traveler, and has carried the principle of self-support into practice in missionary work for a number of years. His pen brings him a sufficient income, through his contributions to one of the leading Calcutta journals, to meet all his ordinary expenses and also to enable him to devote time and effort to Christian work in different quarters. It is his plan to limit his literary labors so that he may devote as much of his time as possible to missionary work. He is an accomplished linguist, and is able to preach in Hindostani and three of the native dialects of India besides. In the evenings, when in Calcutta, he can be found working in the schools and always with a spiritual purpose in view, and for the sake of the Master. On Sunday he preaches, and in the afternoon he has a class in Sunday school and tells the Gospel story in their own tongue. Occasionally he goes out as a commissioner for his journal to the further provinces of India, and at such times he neglects no opportunity to preach the Gospel. He always makes it a point to decline any compensation for Christian work, no matter how arduous it may be and what sacrifices it may involve.

During the Indian famine several years ago, Mr. Aitken was instrumental in disclosing the true situation of the suffering people, and in awakening public sympathy by his personal journeys to the scenes wax, silk cocoons, and other products of the jungle. Every exertion is made to promote good fellowship with the strangers. Many European ladies and gentlemen go there for the holiday, and the natives enjoy watching them at tennis and other games. Sports of all kinds are provided for the people, and the English ladies give away the prizes. When the writer was there two years ago, two of the athletic contests were won by Lepchas.

Men's Guild which has its headquarters in Edinburgh. There are nearly two thousand Christians scattered in about twenty towns and villages.

Another illustration is a heathen Lepcha house of the best kind. It is raised above ground as a protection against the damp of the heavy rains and against wild beasts and venomous snakes. Cattle are penned under the floor. In front a man and two women are standing, the women with rice-pounders in their hands. What look like three wreaths are strings of wild turnips hung up in the sun to dry before being stored for use. A third illustration is a church with the congregation collected in front. These people are all Lepcha Christians. In their midst is a gong, or heavy disc of metal, which is sounded by striking, to collect the people to service.

changed the wild, forest country into the centre of an immense and remunerative industry. Many Lepchas come down from their own country and work as coolies in the tea gardens, making money at a rate which would be impossible in the backward conditions of Sikkim.

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

AN OLD-FASHIONED MOTHER.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: 1. Samuel 2: 19: "Moreover his mother made him a little coat, and brought it to him from year to year, when she came up with her husband to offer the yearly sacrifice."

THE stories of Deborah and Abigail are very apt to discourage a woman's soul. She says within herself: "It is impossible that I ever achieve any such grandeur of character, and I don't mean to try;" as though a child should refuse to play the eight notes because he cannot execute a "William Tell." This Hannah of the text differs from the persons I just named. She was an ordinary woman, with ordinary intellectual capacity, placed in ordinary circumstances, and yet, by extraordinary piety, standing out before all the ages to come, the model Christian mother. Hannah was the wife of Elkanah, who was a person very much like herself—unromantic and plain, never having fought a battle or been the subject of a marvelous escape. Neither of them would have been called a genius. Just what you and I might be, that was Elkanah and Hannah. The brightest time in all the history of that family was the birth of Samuel. Although no star ran along the heavens pointing down to his birth-place, I think the angels of God stooped at the coming of so wonderful a prophet. As Samuel had been given in answer to prayer, Elkanah and all his family, save Hannah, started up to Shiloh to offer sacrifices of thanksgiving. The cradle where the child slept was altar enough for Hannah's grateful heart; but when the boy was old enough she took him to Shiloh, and took three bullocks and an ephah of flour and a bottle of wine, and made offering of sacrifice unto the Lord, and there, according to a previous vow, she left him; for there he was to stay all the days of his life, and minister in the sanctuary. Years rolled on; and every year Hannah made with her own hand a garment for Samuel, and took it over to him. The lad would have got along well without that garment, for I suppose he was well clad by the ministry of the temple; but Hannah could not be contented unless she was all the time doing something for her darling boy. "Moreover his mother made him a little coat, and brought it to him from year to year, when she came up with her husband to offer the yearly sacrifice."

Hannah stands before you, then, to-day, in the first place, as an industrious mother. There was no need that she work. Elkanah, her husband, was far from poor. He belonged to a distinguished family; for the Bible tells us that he was the son of Jeroham, the son of Elihu, the son of Tohu, the son of Zuph. "Who were they?" you say. I do not know; but they were distinguished people, no doubt, or their names would not have been mentioned. Hannah might have seated herself in her family, and, with folded arms, and dishevelled hair, read novels, from year to year. If there had been any to read; but when I see her making that garment and taking it over to Samuel, I know she is industrious from principle as well as from pleasure. God would not have a mother become a drudge or a slave; he would have her employ all the helps possible in this day in the rearing of her children. But Hannah ought never to be ashamed to be found making a coat for Samuel. Most mothers need no counsel in this direction. The wrinkles on their brow, the pallor on their cheek, the thimble-mark on their finger, attest that they are faithful in their maternal duties. The bloom and the brightness and the vivacity of girlhood have given place to the grander dignity and usefulness and industry of motherhood. But there is a heathenish idea getting abroad in some of the families of Americans; there are mothers who banish themselves from the home circle. For three-fourths of their maternal duties they prove themselves incompetent. They are ignorant of what their children wear, and what their children eat, and what their children read. They entrust to irresponsible persons these young immortals, and allow them to be under influences which may cripple their bodies, or taint their purity or spoil their manners, or destroy their souls. From the awkward cut of Samuel's coat you know his mother Hannah did not make it. Out from under flaming chandeliers, and off from imported carpets, and down the granite stairs, there is coming a great crowd of children in this day, untrained, saucy, incompetent for all the practical duties of life, ready to be caught in the first whirl of crime and sensuality. Indolent and unfaithful mothers will make indolent and unfaithful children. You cannot expect neatness and order in any house where the daughters see nothing but slatternliness and upside-downedness in their parents. Let Hannah be idle, and most certainly Samuel will grow up idle. Who are the industrious men in all our occupations and professions? Who are they managing the merchandise of the world, building the walls, tinning the roofs, weaving the carpets, making the laws, governing the nations, making the earth to quake and heave and roar and rattle with the tread of gigantic enterprises? Who are they? For the most part, they descended from industrious mothers, who, in the old homestead, used to spin their own yarn, and weave their own carpets, and plait their own doormats, and flag their own chairs, and do their own work. The stalwart men and the influential women of this day, ninety-nine out of a hundred of them, came from such an illustrious ancestry of hard knuckles and homespun. And who are these people in society, light as froth, blown every whither of temptation and fashion—the pedlers of filthy stories, the dancing-jacks of political parties, the scum of society, the tavern-lounging, store-infesting, the men of low wink, and filthy doublet, and brass breastpin, and rotten resolutions? For the most part, they came from mothers idle and disgusting, the scandal-mongers of society, going from house to house attending to everybody's business but their own; believing in witches and ghosts, and horse-shoes to keep the devil out of the churn, and by a godless life setting their children on the very verge of hell. The mothers of Samuel Johnson, and of Alfred the Great, and of Isaac Newton, and of St. Augustine, and of Richard Cecil, and of President Edwards, for the most part were industrious, hard-working mothers. Now, while I congratulate all Christian mothers upon the wealth and the modern science which may afford them all kinds of help, let me say that every mother ought to be observant of her children's walk, her children's behavior, her children's food, her children's books, her children's companionships. However much help Hannah may have, I think she ought every year, at least, make one garment for Samuel. The Lord have mercy on the man who is so unfortunate as to have had a lazy mother!

Again: Hannah stands before you to-day as an intelligent mother. From the way in which she talked in this chapter, and from the way she managed this boy, you know she was intelligent. There are no persons in a community who need to be so wise and well-informed as mothers. O, this work of culturing children for this world and the next. This child is timid, and it must be roused up and pushed out into activities. This child is forward, and he must be held back, and tamed down into modesty and politeness. Rewards for one, punishments for another. That which will make George will ruin John. The rod is necessary in one case, while a frown of displeasure is more than enough in another. Whipping and a dark closet do not exhaust all the rounds of domestic discipline. There have been children who have grown up and gone to glory without ever having had their ears boxed. O, how much care and intelligence is necessary in the rearing of children! But in this day, when there are so many books on this subject, no parent is excusable in being ignorant of the best mode of bringing up a child. If parents knew more of dietetics, there would not be so many dyspeptic stomachs and weak nerves and inactive livers among children. If parents knew more of physiology, there would not be so many curved spines and cramped chests and inflamed throats and diseased lungs as there are among children. If parents knew more of art, and were in sympathy with all that is beautiful, there would not be so many children coming out in the world with boorish proclivities. If parents knew more of Christ, and practised more of his religion, there would not be so many little feet already starting on the wrong road, and all around as voices of riot and blasphemy would not come up with such ecstasy of infernal triumph. The eaglets in the eyrie have no advantage over the eaglets of a thousand years ago; the kids have no superior way of climbing up the rocks than the old goats taught them hundreds of years ago; the whelps know no more now than did the whelps of ages ago—they are taught no more by the lions of the desert; but it is a shame that in this day, when there are so many opportunities of improving ourselves in the best manner of culturing children, that so often there is no more advancement in this respect than there has been among the kids and the eaglets and the whelps.

Again: Hannah stands before you to-day as a Christian mother. From her prayers, and from the way she consecrated her boy to God, I know she was good. A mother may have the finest culture, the most brilliant surroundings; but she is not fit for her duties unless she be a Christian mother. There may be well-read libraries in the house; and exquisite music in the parlor; and the canvas of the best artist adorning the walls; and the wardrobe be crowded with tasteful apparel; and the children be wonderful for their attainments, and make the house ring with laughter and innocent mirth; but there is something wofully lacking in that house, if it be not also the residence of a Christian mother. I bless God that there are not many prayerless mothers. The weight of responsibility is so great that they feel the need of a divine hand to help, and a divine voice to comfort, and a divine heart to sympathize. Thousands of mothers have been led to the kingdom of God by the hands of little children. There are hundreds of mothers to-day who would not have been Christians had it not been for the prayers of their little ones. Standing some day in the nursery, they bethought themselves "this child God has given me to raise to eternity. What is my influence upon it? Not being a Christian myself, how can I ever expect him to become a Christian? Lord, help me!" O, are there any mothers, who know nothing of the help of religion? Then I commend to Hannah, the pious mother of Samuel, not think it is absolutely impossible that your children come up iniquitous. O, just such fair brows and bright eyes, soft hands and innocent hearts, crime's victims—extirpating purity from the heart, and rubbing out the smoothness from the brow, and quenching the light of the eye, and shriveling up and poisoning and putrefying and scathing and sinning and blasting and burning with sin and woe.

Every child is a bundle of tremendous possibilities; and whether that child come forth in life, its heart attuned to eternal harmonies, and after a life of fulness on earth, go to a life of joy in heaven; or, whether across it shall eternal discords, and after a life of woe doing on earth, it shall go to a horrible impenetrable darkness and an abyss of measurable plunge, is being decided in nursery song and Sabbath lesson and evening prayer, and walk and ride and frown and smile. O, how many children in glory! crowding all the barmen and lifting a million-voiced hosanna—brought to God through Christian entanglement! One hundred and twenty clergymen were together, and they were telling their experience and their ancestry; and the one hundred and twenty clergymen, how many of them do you suppose assisted, as the means of their conversion, influence of a Christian mother? One hundred out of the hundred and twenty Philip Doddridge was brought to God by the Scripture lesson on the Dutch tile chimney fire-place. The mother thought she is only rocking a child; but at the same time she may be rocking the destiny of empires—rocking the fate of nations—rocking the glories of heaven. The maternal power that may lift a child may press a child down. A daughter came to a worldly mother and said she was a sinner about her sins, and she had been praying all night. The mother said: "Stop praying! I don't believe in prayer. Get over all those religious notions. I'll give you a dress that will cost a hundred dollars, and you may wear it a week to that party." The daughter took the dress; and she moved in the gay city, the gayest of all the gay that night and sure enough, all religious impressions were gone, and she stopped praying. A few months after, she came to die; and in her closing moments said: "Mother, I wish you would bring me that dress that cost five hundred dollars." The mother thought it was a very strange request; but she brought it to please the dying child. "Now," said the daughter, "mother, bring that dress on the foot of my bed; the dress was hung there, on the foot of the bed. Then the dying girl got up on one elbow and looked at her mother, and then pointed to the dress, and said: 'Mother, that dress is the price of my soul!' O, what a momentous thing it is to be a mother!

Again, and lastly: Hannah stands before you to-day, the rewarded mother. For all the coats she made for Samuel; for the prayers she offered for him; for the discipline she exerted over him, she had abundant compensation in the piety and the usefulness and the popularity of her son Samuel; and that is true in all ages. Every mother gets full pay for all her prayers and tears in behalf of her children.

For a time Mr. Aitken was engaged in connection with the work of Bishop Thoburn, of the Methodist Church in India, but in order that he might carry out more fully the principle of self-support, he gave up his appointment and attached himself to the work of the Free Church of Scotland. At one time he was connected with the management of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, after which he returned to India to resume his missionary and literary efforts. He returned to Calcutta only a few months ago, after a visit to this county and Europe. His article, which appears on the first page, is the result of a recent journey to the region which he so interestingly describes.

Savages Soothed by Music.

"We made great friends of them by the aid of my violin, and the chief himself paid such court to us that we were literally obliged to remain as guests at the Royal Kraal for over a week. My music did indeed have charms to soothe the savage breast, since they forgot all thought of hostility in listening to my simple melodies. It was most comical to see a great crowd of them squatting on their haunches at sunrise or sunset, and staring at me

Armenia's Woes.

No Present Prospect of Bettering the Condition of Her Persecuted People.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD has earned the gratitude of thousands of people by its earnest pleadings of their cause. Thousands of prayers ascend to God daily, asking for blessings upon them.

"Thirty days have passed since we were imprisoned here waiting for the visitation of God. Our hopes are on the Lord, our families wail over us, a owls over ruins. You can imagine the sad condition of our families and our people, they are like sheep without a shepherd. Our spiritual condition is better in this prison than when we were free; I believe this imprisonment has become a great spiritual benefit to me and my comrades. I have my Bible with me. I read from it selected passages and explain them. We pray and get comfort and strength by prayer. Though we are imprisoned and secluded we cannot be careless and indifferent to the bodily and spiritual condition of our people. We are informed that they have a hard life to bear. They are most needy.

This is a true picture of Armenia to-day—true to Christ and all her sufferings; faithful to the end.

During the week these additional contributions have been received to aid the destitute in Armenia:

THE GERMAN COLONY AT KHAIFFA, PALESTINE

ingly describes, and where Christian missionaries are now doing a wonderful work.

Khaiffa's German Colony.

Of the many colonies that have settled in Palestine in recent years, one of the most interesting and successful is that founded by a number of substantial German immigrants near Khaiffa. A photograph of the colony's lands and buildings is given on the opposite page. The houses are substantial structures of brick and stone, and the colony—a little town in itself—is laid out with broad avenues and neat, regular gardens, in marked contrast to the straggling and tortuous streets and the dilapidated dwellings of the average native town in Palestine. The German colony is said to be fairly prosperous. First a small party of pioneers came out and decided upon a location, the home organization meanwhile paying the expenses of the journey. This first experiment represented a great deal of self-denial on the part of those who were left at home. By-and-by the entire party—including mothers and children—came to find their new homes already fairly well established, and the land improved and ready for agricultural use. Thrift and intelligent industry have done the rest, and now there is no more attractive settlement than theirs anywhere in the borders of Palestine. It is believed that this well-located, young colony has a prosperous future be-

"We parted from the Mashakalumbwes with many friendly expressions of mutual goodwill and regret, and as an assurance of the pleasure my music had given them, fully a dozen of the men who had once greeted us in such a hostile spirit accompanied us for nearly a day's march."

David's Kindness.

Sunday School Lesson for Aug. 2. II. Sam. 9:1-13. Golden Text, Rom. 12:10. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

DAVID, when he was in prosperity, did not forget the friend of his youth, the faithful Jonathan, who had once even stripped himself of his princely robes to put them upon David (I. Sam. 18:4). Nor could he forget the covenant which he and Jonathan had made together, when Jonathan, to all appearance heir to the throne of Israel, acknowledged the claims of David to that throne, on other than earthly grounds, as the "anointed of the Lord." Jonathan at that time besought David, "Thou shalt not only while yet I live shew me the kindness of the Lord, that I die not; but also thou shalt not cut off thy kindness from my house forever; no, not when the Lord hath cut off the enemies of David, every one, from the face of the earth" (I. Sam. 20:14, 15). "So Jonathan made a covenant with the house of David."

Now the enemies of David were cut off, his kingdom was established, and it was time that he should Redeem his Promise.

"And David said, Is there yet any that is left of the house of Saul, that I may shew him kindness for Jonathan's sake?" An investigation brought to light that there still existed a former servant of Saul, whose name was Ziba. Oh, how fallen was the house of Saul! Once he had appealed to his people, "Hear now, ye Benjamites; will the son of Jesse give every one of you fields and vineyards, and make you all captains of thousands, and captains of hundreds?" (I. Sam. 22:7). Where was now the prosperity of Saul's adherents, that it needed investigation to discover so much as a servant remaining to the name of Saul? The man whom the people had chosen for their own glory, that they might be "like the nations," had miserably perished, and left neither name nor memorial nor posterity to keep alive his remembrance among his people. "The wicked shall perish, and the enemies of the Lord shall be as the fat of lambs; they shall consume; into smoke shall they consume away" (Ps. 37:20).

David commanded that Ziba should be brought to him, and being satisfied of his identity, he inquired, "Is there not yet any of the house of Saul, that I may shew the kindness of God unto him?" "Jonathan hath yet a son, which is lame on his feet," was the reply. "Where is he?" asked the king. "Behold, he is in the house of Machir, the son of Ammiel, in Lo-debar," was Ziba's answer. And the same King David, who had given orders for the slaughter of the lame and the blind, which were "hated of David's soul," in the stronghold of Zion, treated the lame son of Jonathan with as much consideration as though he had been his own son. David's love and hatred were not regulated by impulse or personal feeling; God had his part in all. Mephibosheth could be of no use to David; his existence must be a burden upon somebody; but by grace, for the sake of his father, David sent for him and took him into his household. "And Jonathan brought him once again to court. And when the king saw him, he said, 'Behold, thy father's servant is here.' But the king called him by name: 'Mephibosheth,' and he answered, 'Behold thy servant.' The king said unto him, 'Fear not, for I will surely shew thee kindness for Jonathan thy father's sake, and will restore thee all the land of Saul thy father; and thou shalt eat bread at my table continually." Royally did David shew the kindness of God to the grandson of his greatest enemy. And Mephibosheth, cripple as he was in body, manifested a spirit which appreciated the disinterested love of David. "What is thy servant," he said, "that thou shouldst look upon such a dead dog as I am?"

Why should this little episode be told us in such detail, except it were to teach us of the love of David's Son? How it pictures the kindness of God to lost sinners, in him who, through his own death of shame, and his resurrection in our human flesh, has purchased the right to lift up the sinner and the beggar "out of the dung hill; that he may set him with princes, even with the princes of his people!" (Ps. 113:7, 8.) If Mephibosheth was as a "dead dog," utterly useless to King David, much more are we utterly useless to our Lord, except by his grace and his Spirit. Saul's descendants, even Jonathan, fell in battle. Mephibosheth was only saved from a similar fate by his lameness. His utter weakness had been his salvation. And now that David sought him out, and put him in a place of honor at his own table, the cripple knew himself to be in himself not useless only, but offensive. And yet, the "dead dog" served a noble purpose: his presence at David's table was the constant proof of David's faithfulness to Jonathan; and while the cripple could neither expect nor receive honor himself, his presence served the purpose of justifying God that a man after his own heart was sitting on the throne of Israel. Let us take our place as the "dead dog" in ourselves, and we shall serve to honor our beloved Master and to reflect credit upon him.

Ziba, the servant, was commissioned to act as agent of all the land that had belonged to Saul, that it might be cultivated for the benefit of Mephibosheth, but Ziba who could be of some use remained always a servant, while the useless Mephibosheth was always a king's son. Personal advantage may make a servant; but it cannot make a king's son. To be at the King's table we must have other than personal claims; it must be not by virtue of our service but for his sake. "We have forsaken all and followed thee, what shall we have therefore (Matt. 19:27) is the servant-spirit. "So Mephibosheth dwelt in Jerusalem; for he did eat continually at the king's table; and was lame on both his feet." Wherever he went he must be carried, a helpless log, yet precious for the sake of another.

But every true child of God must be tried, and Mephibosheth was no exception. Absalom's rebellion against his father took place about sixteen years later; and Ziba, the servant, seeing his opportunity to recommend himself at the cost of Mephibosheth, quickly loaded two asses with provision, when David fled from Jerusalem, and met the king, just after he had ascended the Mount of Olives, and presented his offering. "What meanest thou by these?" was the first word of David, and the servant replied, "The asses be for the king's household to ride on; and the bread and summer fruit for the young men to eat; and the wine, that such as be faint in the wilderness may drink." It was a deep-laid scheme; his helpless master was at his mercy, and when David very naturally inquired, "And where is thy master's son?" he answered, "Behold, he abideth at Jerusalem; for he said, to-day shall the house of Israel restore me the kingdom of my father."

Without any possibility of verifying his words, the king believed Ziba, and said to him, "Behold, thine are all that pertaineth unto Mephibosheth." Poor, maligned, helpless Mephibosheth! But every man is only what he is proved to be when he is tested, and this was no small test to Mephibosheth. Ziba had accomplished his purpose, he did obeisance, saying, "I humbly beseech thee that I may find grace in thy sight, my Lord, O king." Ziba was a slanderer; and such are called in Greek, diaboloi, devils (I. Tim. 3:2; II. Tim. 3:3, translated "false accusers"). It is such who do the devil's work. But through real injury done to us, God tests us and proves us, to see if we learn to look by faith not at "the things which are seen," the persons who injure us, but at "the things which are not seen," the education of our Lord who puts us to the test, as to whether we will keep the place of "dead dog" under such an injury, and count that "a dead dog" has no rights on earth.

LESSON POINTS.

Suggestions and Illustrations for the Use of Sunday School Teachers.

"I WILL SURELY SHew THEE KINDNESS."

THREE characters beside David deserve special notice in this lesson. First, we have David moved by a generous impulse. Great men are counted good when they respond to appeals for help. But here we have a man seeking opportunity for service. The Christian is not living up to Christ's ideal if he is not looking for objects on whom he can lavish his kindness. It is the right spirit. Your next door neighbor, or the family in the next block, is in trouble. Do you know it? You would if your kindness were so full and abounding that you were looking for some one you could help. In these days no one need waste much time in that way. No one need go far to find some one who wants help that he can render. And see what a pleasant surprise the search brought. David was looking for a descendant of his old enemy, and when he finds one, lo, it is the son of his best friend. It was a duty that David set out to perform, and when he puts his hand to it, it turns into a pleasure.

Then there is the character of Mephibosheth, a young man probably about twenty years old, afflicted with deformity. Once a prince and the direct heir to the throne, now a cripple and dependent on charity. Life had become very bitter to him before he would compare himself to the creature so repulsive to an Oriental as a dead dog. It seemed when the king sent for him that he was about to lose his life. Instead, he was made a royal guest, and an estate was conferred upon him. In one day the whole condition of his life was changed. He had been too hasty in regarding himself as a dead dog. Even in the darkest seasons men should not lose heart. No one knows what God may have in store for him.

Another character in the lesson deserving notice is Ziba, the servant of Mephibosheth. Josephus says that he was a slave who was set at liberty when Saul and Jonathan were killed. He had evidently prospered, as at the time David sent for him he had fifteen sons and twenty slaves of his own. David's provision for Mephibosheth puts Ziba again in a position of servitude. The story of II. Samuel 16:1-4 and 19:24-30 impresses the reader with the idea that he plotted to get the whole estate by a mean trick on his master. One of the asses he offered to David was certainly Mephibosheth's, and it is evident that the lame man was thus prevented from following his royal patron. David evidently did not know which to believe, but apparently suspected Ziba of imposing on him. A man suddenly enriched has need to keep a close watch on himself lest the passion of avarice get hold of him and lead him into sin.

The other character is Machir of Lo-debar. He gave shelter to the unfortunate lame prince, an act which must have required some courage in those times, as could not tell whether David might regard the act as disloyalty to him. Machir, however, yielded to his generous impulse, and later, when David himself needed succor, came promptly to him (II. Samuel 17:27-29). The kindly does kindness to those in need with concerning himself about prudence.

I will show thee kindness for Jonathan, father's sake. A pathetic story occurs in a work of one of our greatest novelists is that of a miller, who, through business depression and litigation, becomes in straits for money. He recollects that the band of his sister owes him a large sum which he had lent him when he had money to spare. He rides over to brother-in-law's farm and tells his sister that he needs that money. The pained expression of the woman's face shows what it will cost to pay it. The wheat in the barn and stock in the fields, even the furniture must have to be sold if her brother insists his due. He listens to her story and is sorry, but necessity is upon him. He must have money to meet his obligation and if he cannot get that which belongs to him he will have to borrow. As he rides away stern and unrelenting, his sister asks after his daughter. "A girl," continues the woman. "I hope Tom will be good to her, as you have ways been to me. They are just two brother and sister—as you and I were. As the miller rides away his sister's work to do their work. If his dearly loved daughter should be in need after he is dead, hopes his boy would be good to her. He would like Tom to act in such a case as this? He reins in his horse, turns around and rides back to his sister's home and tells her not to trouble. He will manage in some way to do without the money it was remitted for his daughter's sake."

Is there not yet any of the house of Saul? David did not wait for them to appeal to him. He sought them out. A youth was arrested for stealing a watch. Word was sent to his father and mother in the country. They were honest people, proud of their good name. When the mother heard she fainted, and when they brought her around, it was found that she was paralyzed. The father went to his son's rescue, and after restitution and earnest pleading obtained his discharge. Then went to another son who was employed the same city. "Why did you not go after your brother?" he asked. "Why did you allow our name to be disgraced the boy to get a prison taint and your mother to be stricken down?" The young man pleaded that he had no idea the boy was going wrong. "You were too engrossed with your own affairs," said the father. "If you had made yourself your brother's keeper, as you ought, how much sorrow and suffering and shame we might have been saved!"

Jonathan hath yet a son. A Scottish clergyman relates an incident which occurred in London a few years ago. A fellow-countryman was in the great city on business. As he hurried down Ludgate Hill, he saw a half-clothed girl crouching in a doorway. He caught but a glimpse of her face, but that glimpse went to his heart. It was a face so full of sorrow and misery. He felt that he could do nothing, he was comparatively poor, he was very busy, and was a delicate matter for a man to undertake. So he reasoned and fully justified himself in leaving her in her misery. But his heart would not let him do it. He felt so uncomfortable that he turned back toward the cathedral, and plodded up till he came to the doorway where he had seen the girl. She was there still. He replied to his question betrayed her Scottish nationality. She was homeless, sick and starving. "Come with me," he said, "I will not leave a Scotch lassie to perish." He took her to his humble lodging, fed her and bade her remain there for the night, while he sought out another refuge. The next day he was to return to Scotland. He asked the girl if he could do anything for her before he left. In her gratitude to him, she told him her story. She was the runaway daughter of his own landlord for whom her heart-broken father had been searching for three years. He could tell her that her father was waiting to forgive her and she joyfully returned with him to Scotland. "May God forever bless you," said the old man, as he clasped his tenant's hand, "I'll never forget that it was you that saved my bairn."

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR'S HOST.

The Great International Convention of Christian Endeavor Societies in Washington, D. C., listens to the Record of the Year's Work—Meetings of Praise and Prayer.

THE NATIONAL CAPITOL NEAR WHICH THE C. E. CONVENTION WAS HELD.

WASHINGTON has seen many vast gatherings in the course of its history, but probably never has it entertained a Convention which presented so combined qualities of size, consecration, and religious enthusiasm in such degree as that which assembled in the city on June 9. The city gave the Christian Endeavor hosts a right royal welcome. In none of the previous fourteen conventions of Christian Endeavor Societies had so much work been done to have everything in readiness for the coming of the great army of Christian workers. So thoroughly sympathized was every detail of the Committee's work, that every delegation was met on its arrival, and found its headquarters prepared and decorated for its reception, and every arrangement made for its comfort. For two years, preparations have been making for this Convention, and they have evidently been years of hard and intelligent work. Mr. W. H. H. Smith, the Chairman of the Committee, and his colleagues were warmly commended for the perfection of their arrangements. On their side, they acknowledged the cordial co-operation they had found on all hands. Congress had passed, without dissenting voice, the act necessary to allow the Convention to meet on the public reservation of the White Lots, and the seventy-five churches of the city had been freely placed at the disposal of the Committee. The Convention, therefore, found itself a welcome guest. The weather alone was unpropitious. Wind and rain combined against it. They succeeded in overturning Tent Williston, one of the three gigantic tents in which the meetings were to be held. But the meetings which should have been held there were held in Central Hall, and after thirty-six hours the tent was again in position.

The preliminary meetings on Wednesday evening in the churches struck the keynote of the Convention. As Dr. F. E. Clark, the Christian Endeavor President, in his opening remarks, the Convention was for inspiring and uplifting, not for business. The first meetings were therefore appropriately occupied with praise and prayer. On Thursday morning the Convention proper assembled and it was seen what a mighty host had come together. The two tents and the great Hall were crowded, and a vast choir of four thousand voices distributed in the five meetings led such a volume of praise as rarely heard. The following Invocation Hymn, written by Col. John Hay, for this occasion thrilled every heart:

INVOCATION.

Lord! from far-severed climes we come
To meet at last in thee, our Home;
From whoso hast bestowed our guide and guard,
Be still our hope, our rich reward.

Defend us Lord from every ill,
Strengthen our hearts to do thy will;
In all we plan, and all we do,
Still keep us to thy service true.

Let us hear the inspiring word,
Which they of old at Horeb heard;
Breathe to our hearts the high command,
"Go onward and possess the land!"

Thou who art Light, shine on each soul!
Thou who art Truth, each mind control!
Open our eyes and make us see
The path "which leads to Heaven and thee."
JOHN HAY.

Mr. W. H. H. Smith realized how heartily his arrangements were appreciated in the ovation he received when he came forward to give his address of welcome. "Welcome!" he cried when he could make himself heard, "Welcome! A hundred times welcome! Welcome for all, of whatever nation, or people, or denomination, who own allegiance to our Lord Jesus Christ.

Welcome to each heart as I welcome:
Welcome to Washington, D. C.,
Welcome this day."

President F. E. Clark's address was full of stimulus and inspiration. With a humorous reference to the great political conventions recently held, he proceeded to state the platform of Christian Endeavor. These were the planks as Dr. Clark recognized them: First, Our Covenant Prayer-meeting pledge—the Magna Charta of Christian Endeavor. Second, Our Consecration Meeting—guaranteeing the spiritual character of the Society. Third, Our Committees—giving to each active member some specific and definite work "for Christ and the Church. Fourth, Our Interdenominational and International Fellowship, based upon our denominational and national loyalty. Fifth, Our Individual Independence and Self-government, free from control of United Society, State or local union, convention or committee; all of which exist for fellowship and inspiration, not for legislation. Sixth, Our individual Subordination as societies to our own churches, of which we claim to be an integral, organic, inseparable part. Seventh, Our Christian Citizenship plank—our country for Christ, but, as a Society, no entangling political alliances. Our missionary plank—Christ for the world. Eighth, Our ultimate Purpose—to deepen the spiritual life and raise the religious standards of young people the world over.

Then briefly he gave figures which must have surprised people who have not kept track of the progress of the Society from year to year: Forty-six thousand societies have been formed. Five millions of Endeavorers have been enrolled, of whom more than two millions seven hundred thousand are to-day members. Two millions of others, Endeavorers in all but name, have probably been enrolled in purely denominational societies. Ten million Endeavor meetings have been held. Five million copies of the constitution have undoubtedly been printed, in forty different languages, and at least fifteen million copies of the pledge. Over one million of our associate members have come into the evangelical churches connected with fifty denominations, influenced in part, at least, by the Christian Endeavor Society; and it is certain that over two millions of dollars have been given in benevolence through denominational and church channels.

These were great figures, but Dr. Clark was anxious for further progress. Under the type of a marriage, he pointed out how Christian Endeavor was uniting denominations, uniting nationalities and uniting such ideas as patriotism and humanity. He concluded with the words: "As steel and copper, hitherto unweldable metals, are welded together by the mighty, subtle power of electricity in a union so complete that no human eye can find the seam, so, by the fusing might of God's spirit in Christian Endeavor, will be welded together fidelity that is true and fellowship that is large-hearted, responsibility that makes strong, and loyalty that makes humble and gentle, patriotism and humanity, organization and spiritual power, now and forever, one and inseparable. And 'What God hath joined together let no man put asunder.'"

The report of Secretary Baer, always an interesting feature of these conventions, presented the year's progress under varied groupings. In the course of his report he said: "Of the States and Provinces that now have each over one thousand Young People's Societies of Christian Endeavor, Pennsylvania still heads the list with 3,273; New York next, 2,971; Ohio, 2,311; Ontario has now passed to fourth place, with 1,317; Illinois, 1,802; Indiana, 1,352; Iowa, 1,302. These figures do not include the numerous other kinds of Christian Endeavor societies that are now fast becoming sturdy branches of the mother tree, such as the Junior, the Intermediate, the Mothers', and the Senior.

"We have not time to investigate the branches in schools, in colleges, in public institutions of all kinds, in prisons, and schools of reform, in almshouses, asylums, institutions for the blind, etc., on board ships, men-of-war, at navy-yards, in life stations, and among life-savers, among the boys in blue in United States barracks in large factories, among car-drivers, policemen and patrolmen, in the Travelers' Union, etc., but we cannot pass by the growth of the Canadian and foreign 'branches.' All Canada has 3,292 societies, and in foreign and missionary lands there are now 6,399 societies enrolled. The United Kingdom has over 3,000;

Australia—

Praise God for that! In all, 231,900 have from Christian Endeavor taken their place in the church of the living God. What a blessed harvest for one year.

From Mr. Baer's report it also appeared that the Christian Endeavor Society has won marked distinction in their assistance to the Home and Foreign Mission Boards of the various churches. The Society has a roll of honor on which such contributions are recorded. On the roll are 5869 Young People's Societies, and 2311 Juniors. These 8200 Societies have given to the cause of Home and Foreign Missions during the year $154,022.68, and they have also given to other causes in the church, $206,150.21, making a grand total of $360,172.89, which has been given by these Societies for church purposes during the year.

The presentation of two banners was another business, which like the report and the address, indicated the progress of Christian Endeavor principles. The banner for the greatest absolute increase of societies went to the English delegation. During the past year England has added a thousand societies and forty thousand members to her Christian Endeavor army. The banner for the greatest proportionate increase of societies also is to cross the Atlantic. It has been won by Scotland, which during the year increased the number of her societies from 200 to 315 and the membership from 9,500 to 14,560.

It would be impossible to give even a brief summary of the three hundred meetings which filled the week with joy and blessing. The programme as outlined in this journal on June 24 was faithfully followed and the Washington convention proved the most inspiring of all yet held in the History of Christian Endeavor. Its influence will be felt in every part of our land and beyond the sea.

A Missionary Incident.

The life of a missionary in tropical lands is by no means a bed of roses. He has many hard knocks to bear, many discouragements to face and many discomforts to encounter in the course of his varied experiences. In some parts of India, Arabia lia, over 2,000; France, 66; West Indies, 63; India, 128; Mexico, 62; Turkey, 41; Africa, 38; China, 40; Germany, 18; Japan, 66; Madagascar, 93; and so on until every country in the world is represented, save three or four, making a grand total of 46,125 branches.

"In the United States the denominational representation is as follows: The Presbyterians still lead, with 5,458 Young People's societies and 2,599 Junior societies; the Congregationalists have 4,199 Young People's societies and 2,077 Junior societies; the Disciples of Christ and Christians, 2,641 Young People's societies and 1,087 Junior societies; the Baptists, 2,679 Young People's societies and 927 Junior societies and so on through a long list.

"There is to-day in the 46,125 societies throughout the world a total membership of 2,750,000. And the best of it all is that from our Juniors 21,506, and from our Young People's societies 210,400, have this year joined the churches of America.

and Africa, it is impossible for the white missionary to travel any great distance afoot, owing to the intolerable heat which soon exhausts the strength of those who are not natives. Our photographic illustration on this page, shows one of the many discomforts of travel in such climates. It is an incident from the experience of Mr. Ramseyer, of the Basle Mission to the African Gold Coast. In crossing a patch of woodland, his hammock-bearers have stumbled and the missionary himself "has come to grief" suddenly, though fortunately little worse than a few bruises resulted from the tumble. Such slips frequently occur, when the carriers are tired after a long day's work, and their repetition may very reasonably be accepted as a sign that the dusky-skinned bearers consider their day's work done and want to go into camp at once. If the missionary be wise he will agree to this and save himself further trouble and the possibility of more "incidents" like that so graphically shown in the illustration.

Polly's Bee-hive.

TO begin with, Polly Antrim's beehive was not a real hive with real bees, yet her business in life was, speaking if I may in a parable, the manufacture of honey. She was a tall, slim girl, twenty years old, and very pretty, with her shining hair coiled around her beautiful head, her pale olive cheeks just touched with pink, and her dark-brown eyes. Polly Antrim made caps for a living, old ladies' caps, of delicate lace, with dainty bows and frills, and she had a number of customers, who always bought their new caps of her, and sent her their old ones to do over when they were a trifle shabby. As a general thing, old ladies don't wear caps in these days, more's the pity, for nothing is quite so becoming to a soft wrinkled face, and thinning hair, but there are always a few elderly women who adhere to old styles and who are willing to pay a good price for a handsome thing. Among these Polly had her trade, and, year in and year out, her nimble fingers and charming taste brought quite money enough in to keep her and her mother in comfort.

What about the beehive? I'm coming to that. The Antrims lived on the top floor of a tenement house in a nice neighborhood, where very respectable people had their pleasant flats. This house, and the next, and the next, and the one across the street, and the one at the corner where the grocery was, and many another in the same part of the town, swarmed with children. Polly took it in her head one day to have a little evening school for some of these, and to call it a beehive because if she had called it a school they would never have come. There was a large empty room over the grocer's stable and she borrowed that, promising that there would be no mischief done, and holding herself responsible for the good conduct of her little friends.

"And pray, Miss Polly, what are you going to learn them?" asked Mr. Ashe, the grocer.

"To sing, and to knit," said Polly, confidentially. "I'm going to keep them out of the street till bed time, three nights a week, if they'll only be allowed to come to me. The first night there is a bit of trouble, Mr. Ashe, you can turn us all out, and never believe in me any more."

"Better let her try it," said the good natured policeman who had kept order on that street, and knew Polly's nice ways with children.

The first night they gathered around Polly, most of them had to sit on the floor, but they were not particular and the eight or ten who had been invited to form a club, were so interested in making plans and rules that they would not have found fault had they been compelled to stand up the whole hour. When Polly had at last said, "Now girls and boys, we're going to call this the Beehive Club, because bees are busy and bright and bold and brave." There was a general clapping of hands, and one little fellow piped up,

"Bees make honey, don't they, out of flowers. We haven't got no flowers."

"We've got to be flowers and bees both," said Polly. "We're bees—got to sweeten the world for our people at home, and help everybody to be happy. Jimmy Morrison, I nominate you for President of the Beehive."

Jimmy Morrison, a red-haired, rough-fisted little fellow of ten, had been sidling out of the room, but on hearing that he was to be elected President, he returned, beamed, and said, "Kiss me, and I'll appeal to the boys, but whittling did, and Polly had provided work of some kind for everybody, and in the course of a few nights, everybody was sure to be present, at eight o'clock, when the proceedings began.

"There is a lady, one of my dear cap-ladies," said Polly, "who will buy all the lace and all the horse-reins the girls can knit at the Bee-hive, and also all the perfectly smooth, round sticks the Bee-hive boys can whittle. When the money for these comes in, we'll have a feast at the Bee-hive, so its worth while for everybody to work."

The gentle, white-haired cap-lady behind Polly was a shut-in. She had not walked a step for ten years. But she belonged to God's great hive of busy bees, and helped to make honey, even though she never left her room.

Well, the weeks passed by as weeks do, one day at a time, and there came a night when there were very sorrowful faces at the Bee-hive Club. They tried to sing, but sobs choked them. They tried to knit, but the girls dropped their hands idly in their laps. The President didn't need to rap for order. Everybody was in order already. Polly Antrim was very ill indeed with diphtheria.

Mr. Ashe came to the door, "You young folks better keep still to-night, and not sing 'Glory, hallelujah!' Polly's very low, I've heard."

"As if we wanted to sing Glory, hallelujah!" said red-haired Jimmy in a flash. "I tell you we'd better do, kids! We'll have a prayer-meeting in this here Bee-hive, and ask God to let Polly get well."

"What good will that do!" said one little infidel. "The doctor can't cure her, they say!"

All the infidels in the world are not grown-up. There are children who have had such hard and bitter lives among evil associates that they have forgotten the sweetness and simple faith of childhood. God help such poor, forlorn children. God help us to open their eyes.

Jimmy turned on the young speaker.

"What good will it do to pray? It'll bring heaven down here to drive away the sickness, and it'll show the doctor what he must do next. Never ask such an ignorant question as that, Leopold—never again."

The scene in the next half hour was a curious and pathetic one. Voice after voice was lifted in simple pleading, "Do, dear Lord Jesus, do please spare our Polly. The Bee-hive needs her. The cap-ladies need her. Her old mammy needs her. Please, dear Christ, save Polly, but 'Thy will be done.'"

When the children left the Bee-hive and crept quietly home, they were very silent. Some of them cried themselves to sleep. Sturdy Jimmy alone marched to his house with head erect and confident bearing.

"God will answer our prayers!" he said cheerily, "I am not afraid."

We, who are more familiar than Jimmy was with the Bible, remember certain ringing phrases, "Is thine arm shortened that it cannot save? Thine ear heavy that it cannot hear?" Thank God, this never happens. God always hears, can always save. His right hand and his holy arm can bring the victory. Even over a foul fiend of disease, the only thing always to be reconciled to the will that cannot make a mistake, the blessed, perfect will of God.

Polly lived. She still carries on the Beehive Club. She still makes caps for dear old ladies. And the earth is a happier place because Polly is in it.

As for Jimmy, I expect great things of him yet. He is a manly young Christian. What more can be said?

MARGARET E. SANGSTER.

Persia's Royal Heir.

LIKE almost all Eastern monarchial countries, Persia has a history in which the violent deposition and the assassination of its rulers are strikingly prominent. Usually, after the death of a monarch, the country would be quiet for a little space, until new intrigues were developed and new plots were laid against the throne. Since the assassination of Shah Nasr-ed-din, Teheran, the capital, has been comparatively quiet, owing largely to the energetic precautions of the Prime Minister, Mirzi Ali Khan. The Premier is under forty years of age and is one of the most enlightened men in Persia. He visited Europe several years ago and is well acquainted with European customs and with many of the features of western civilization.

Prince Mohammed Ali, the son of Muzaffer, the new Shah has been proclaimed as the successor to the throne. He is not the eldest son, but is the only one of many brothers who is of royal blood, his mother being a princess. He has lately been proclaimed "Vai-Ahd" or Crown Prince. Prince Ali is a well educated young man of twenty-four, and is considered by many to be a prince of considerable promise and force of character.

Mirza Riza, the assassin of the late Shah, was a peddler of Teheran. He is said to be neither a lunatic nor a religious enthusiast and the motive for his crime has not yet become apparent. He is well treated in prison (contrary to the usual custom in Persia, where political offenders or traitors are concerned), and is carefully watched, in the hope that by this treatment he may be persuaded to disclose his accomplices.

Lumbermen and Miners' Mission.

MISS EMMA NASON, the faithful missionary, whose labors among the lumbermen and miners of the Northwest are already known to many of our readers, writes as follows:

Yours was received with seventeen dollars from the readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. It came at a timely and great need.

We had to go through our mission field in the face of a severe winter, and through the iron ranges among the miners, visiting our lodging and coffee houses, and taking notes of the urgent need at every point of the work. We thank God it is on a good foundation. If only we can pull through this hard time. The great need now is all opening and now the Gospel of our Christ must be preached to those who have never before. There was such a need here, Rev. Geo. E. Shorter, and his Gospel wagon to come to those iron towns that the aid could not be resisted. Rev. Mr. Shorter and his family have already gone with the Gospel wagon, and they are in constant danger of death. A number of men have been buried in one of these mines. I was there but after being for hours in their grave they were brought out alive, perhaps by our Gospel and be saved from everlasting death. We believe there will be great work at Hurley helping Hurley, Ironwood and Ashland we are without an evangelist at Sault Ste. Marie, a young man of the Moody Bible Institute is ready to come as soon as his expenses can be paid.

Clearing Out Sales

Gospel Hymns.

THERE ARE many churches, especially in small towns and villages that would be glad of an opportunity to get a number of copies of "Gospel Hymns" at a greatly reduced price. The benefit of such churches, we would state that we have on hand a number of copies of Gospel Hymns, Nos. 1 to 6 C. solidated, Music Edition, that have been injured almost imperceptibly in packing. Otherwise they are in perfect condition. Those who desire to obtain copies, do well to write quickly to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, as we are now closing the entire lot, and will be glad to have many of our friends as possible avail themselves of this exceptional opportunity.

Library Premiums.

—OUR LIBRARY Premiums proved an immense success, and we have a flood of letters in praise. While the sets were being sent out by thousands few sets, the cases of which have been slightly soiled or rubbed were laid aside. On examination, we find that the books all those cases are perfect and intact, not a mark or blemish being distinguishable. The cases, however, are slightly scratched as we have accordingly decided to sacrifice those sets—there is on a limited number of them—$1.50 each, we prepaying charges. Each case contains ten books the entire lot constituting a charming little home library, that will afford many hours of amusement, summer or winter.

Bible Helps.

—"WHAT A FLOOD of illuminating your little, compact volume of 'Bible Helps' has proved to me," writes a subscriber who teaches a Sunday School class in Vermont town. "I am no longer at a loss in arriving at a clear understanding of many of those passages that formerly were more or less of a mystery and a tangle, in the 'Helps' I have the aid right at hand the ablest theological scholars, past and present—a privilege that would have cost me many hundreds of dollars, had I to buy their books, besides the labor of reading and digesting them. All this I find for me in the 'Helps'. Even if I had no Sunday School class, and lived alone on some mountain-side, still I should not want to be without the little book, since it assists me to read my Bible understandingly. Any of our readers can have a copy of 'The Helps to the Study of the Bible,' mailed, postage prepaid, by sending 50 cents to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD office. It is a library in petto, which should be in the possession of every Bible-reading man or woman young or old in America."

Sen. Blair's Temperance Pamphlet.

—NOTHING THAT has been printed in recent years, has done more to revitalize the interest in Temperance than ex-Senator Blair's famous pamphlet, "The Temperance Reform." It is a masterly and complete presentation of this great and absorbing subject—one that goes to the root of our prosperity and happiness as a nation and as individuals. Senator Blair has not confined himself to "stock" arguments by any means; indeed, his pamphlet is striking in its bold and original treatment of the whole matter. One of the finest and most practical chapters in the pamphlet is that which shows the duty of churches and Christian communities, and we would be pleased to have it in the hands of our readers generally. Copies of the pamphlet will be mailed to any address at a cost of five cents each or three dollars a hundred.

From Hot Slums  to Cool Fields.

Fresh-Air Fund's Work Among the Neglected Children—Puny Lives Saved and Sad Little Hearts Cheered.

For those readers of this journal and their friends who have aided in supporting our Fresh-Air work at Mont-Lawn could only spend a few hours with the army of tenement children now gathered there, they would feel amply repaid for the effort and outlay. It is certainly a simple and practical way of doing good, to send some little maid or lad from the dirt and misery of a tenement for a sojourn among green fields, with the advantages of wholesome food and Christian training and example. Cite a number of friends who have read of our work at the Children's Home, have contributed various amounts, some sending $3 to give one child a holiday, others sending an amount representing ten days of real enjoyment for two or more little ones. We could wish that every reader who has the cause of these wee waifs at heart might be represented by at least one child, provided with an outing at so trifling an expense. There are hundreds, indeed, thousands, who stand sorely in need of it at this torrid season.

During these sweltering summer days, when the poor, little morsels of humanity, who dwell in the foul and fever-breeding alleys and alleys of the crowded city, are suffering from those ailments that never fail to appear in such quarters every summer, it is a precious boon to them to be taken to Mont-Lawn. Away from the dirt and disease, from the vice and profanity, the stench of food and pestilential atmosphere, to a region where heaven's pure air is uncontaminated, and skies are blue, and where the pretty surroundings, the nourishing food, the kind matron and assistants combine to make them as happy as children can be. That is, a change so radical and complete that the little guests are often at a loss to comprehend what it all means. But, with the philosophy, they soon accustom themselves to the change, although each new day brings surprises. Occasionally, amid the happy group, playing on the lawn or among the flowers out in the field, one sees a serious-faced wee man or woman. Usually it is not very difficult to learn what the thoughts are far away with the mother and the little brothers and sisters in some rear tenement home, who never had no such good times as this. Good times! There is a world of pathos in the words when we apply them to the case of a child of the tenements.

Sunday is always a day of special interest at the Home. On that day the games and frolics of the week are laid aside. In the forenoon, the little guests are called together and taught the International Sunday School lesson. In the afternoon, at four o'clock, they gather in the little chapel where an hour is spent in singing hymns, reading the Scriptures, prayer, and short addresses or possibly a sermonette. At the close of this simple service, which is always greatly enjoyed by the children, they march to the Dining Hall where tea is served. On a recent Sunday they were addressed briefly by Rev. Jacob Freshman and Mr. J. W. Cannon, the Evangelist, after which Dr. Klopsch spoke for a few minutes. At the Sunday School lesson their answers are frequently very bright, showing remarkably acute minds, quick to understand and appreciate the meaning of the lesson when it has been explained to them.

Among the children at the Home this season are many sickly and deformed, who in former years would have been rejected. This is owing to the presence of a house-physician at the Home, whose medical treatment has proved very beneficial to the little sufferers. One child had an ugly abscess on the lower jaw, another had eyes and ears and lips affected with persistent sores, but Dr. Hall's skilful treatment has already made a great change in the condition of the little patients. When it is stated that there are now seldom less than twenty-five sickly ones at Mont-Lawn at any time, the importance of the medical department will be better appreciated. These pale and emaciated little patients have already learned to love the Home and its kind doctor and nurses. It is surprising what an improvement a single week sometimes produces. When the child is obviously in need of a longer stay to effect a permanent improvement, the ten-day rule is relaxed in its behalf, and its outing is extended for a few days and possibly a week longer. Several of the little invalids have been sent home fully restored.

One seldom sees anything lovelier than the scene that occurs at Mont-Lawn every evening when the new party of children arrives. They drive up merrily singing the "Home Cry":

Here we are! Here we are!
C. H. H. Ha! ha! ha!

and are received by House-Mother Collins and her staff of caretakers, each with a division of boys or girls under her charge, and all waving handkerchiefs or caps.

Each new set of children have all the beauties of the country to discover over again for themselves. Coming upon the steamer Christenah, they ask: "They bees flowers in the country, ain't they? Durst we take them home?" Some of the expressions used by these little street Arabs would puzzle a grammatical teacher to analyze. Here are some examples: "This is the nicest country what I was ever to." "Did you went with the teacher?" One child speaking of a favorite caretaker, who had gone, said: "I wish she had stood yet." One little boy was initiating another into the mysteries of blackberry eating, and he said: "These berries first bees green, then they bees red, then they bees black: you durst only eat them when they bees black or they'll make you sick." One little miss who was accidentally tripped by another girl, ran to her caretaker exclaiming: "Teacher, that girl tumbled me upside down."

Contributions of clothing and underwear for the children will be welcomed at the Home. The following contributions have been received during the week in aid of the Home:

The Other Side.

WE go our ways in life too much alone,
We hold ourselves too far from all our kind;

Too often we are dead to sigh and moan,
Too often to the weak and helpless blind;
Too often where distress and want abide
We turn and pass upon the other side.

The other side is trodden smooth and worn
By footsteps passing idly all the day;
Where lie the bruised ones that faint and mourn
Is seldom more than an untrodden way.
Our selfish hearts are for our feet the guide—
They lead us by upon the other side.

It should be ours the oil and wine to pour
Into the bleeding wounds of stricken ones;
To take the smitten and the sick and sore [runs,
And bear them where a stream of blessing
Instead we look about—the way is wide—
And so we pass upon the other side.

O friends and brothers, gliding down the years,
Humanity is calling each and all
In tender accents, born of grief and tears!
I pray you, listen to the thrilling call!
You cannot, in your cold and selfish pride,
Pass guiltlessly upon the other side.

President Kruger at Home.

ONE who knows President Kruger writes thus concerning the many peculiarities of the Chief of the Boer Republic: When he leaves home nothing will induce him to make his bow in the house of Rimmon. During his visit to England he declined an invitation to a ball on the Queen's birthday, through no want of respect to Her Majesty, but because he considered such things an impropriety in Christian conduct. No more would he set his foot within a theatre for the same reason that the actors were dressed in immodest attire. The Parisians deemed him incurably scrupulous in refusing to attend a dinner party on Sunday on the ground that it would be a violation of the sanctity of the Sabbath. At home he is known to be a man of one book, but it is the book of books,—the Word of God. The Lord's Day he spends in reading the Scriptures in his family and in expounding them in the House of God. For all these things the profanely secular press holds him up to public ridicule, but he enjoys the confidence and respect of his own subjects, the commendation of Christians the world over, and the approval of his own conscience.

True Courtesy.

Courtesy demands and requires cultivation, like other Christian graces. Says a thoughtful writer: It seems to be born in some, and bred in others; but many must acquire the habit of thoughtfulness in mere trifles by persistent effort. Because one does not come naturally by an easy manner and unconscious grace, is no reason why he should despair of becoming a truly courteous person. The thirteenth chapter of I. Corinthians is a manual of etiquette that never grows obsolete. Read in the light of those sentences, conduct is seen to be more than half of life, manners are dignified, love shines through little things and lifts them to its own high level, as "the greatest thing in the world." Our children should be taught the value of all the graces.

African Children's Games.

Bishop Mackenzie, while traveling with a party in Central Africa, found games of whip-top, humming-top, and many others as common among the Africans as among the boys at home, so that that they could teach them nothing new. At last, in despair, they thought they would surprise them by making a kite. All the children assembled to see it; but it turned out lopsided and heavy, and would not go up. So one of the missionaries remarked to them, "You never saw anything like this before, did you?" Whereupon the little fellow replied, "Oh, yes; only the things we have here are different from yours, for ours go up, and yours go down."

Centenarians.

THERE has been much congratulation of a good man on the one hundredth anniversary of his birthday. That a man should be able to stand the climate of this world one hundred years is wonderful. It is fortunate, however, that such longevity is exceptional. Most people have no business to live as long as that. Better work well and hard for awhile, and then be off. If a man have no hope of higher and better residence, the longer he stays here the better. But it is no matter of congratulation that a Christian man is kept so long out of heaven, when his work on earth seems finished. The world is better off now than when its inhabitants lived three or four hundred years. Every few years the world needs a fresh population. The only way to make room here is by emigration. There seems to be a place for children and parents and grandparents, but great-grandparents are usually unhappy themselves, and disturbing to the happiness of others. After ninety years of age life is an affliction. Let us, by attention to all the laws of health and moral behavior, keep our foothold on the earth as long as it seems God's intention that we should stay here; but let us not be fretful and despondent when it seems to be time for embarkation for the next country. To those of us who are fitted for sailing, it will not be a landing like that of the Pilgrim Fathers on a rock-bound coast, amid ice and snow-storms, but a pulling up of our boat amid cacti and groves of orange.

Let Us Pray.

WE are all waiting for our national finances to get disentangled. We are expecting this or that wonderful thing to be done. Meanwhile, there never was so little praying for our rulers as now. In times of war, from Maine to California, in all the churches there was perpetual praying for men in authority. The petitions have mostly ceased, save in the Episcopal Church, where they are a part of the Litany. There was no more need of such supplication in the days of South Mountain and Gettysburg than now. You say those were days of blood, and these are days of peace. We reply, it is more easy to fight without God's help, than to manage public finances. In the art of bloodshed the devil will help us if we can get only a few more dollars; but in the art of alleviating business depression, we shall get no help unless we get it from the Lord. Some of us have depended on this and others or that, but it is quite time that we begin to look higher. Let us implore God's help for our Government as earnestly as in the days when our fathers and brothers were in battle. Let all our pulpits again take up the call on heaven for deliverance. On rail-car, and ferry-boat, and in drawing-room, and in legislative hall we hear plans for national relief. Now we propose this: let us pray.

Editor's Waste-Basket.

ON our way out the newspaper rooms we stumbled over the basket in which are deposited the literary material which we cannot use. The basket upset and surprised us with its contents. On the top were some things that looked like fifteen or twenty poems. People outside have no idea of the amount of rhyme that comes to a printing office. The fact is that at some period in everyone's life he writes "poetry." His existence depends upon it. We wrote ten or fifteen verses ourselves once. Had we not written them just there and then we might not be here. They were in long metre, and "Old Hundred" would have fitted them grandly. Many people are seized with the poetic spasm when they are sick, and their lines are apt to begin with

"O mortality! how frail art thou!"

Others on Sabbath afternoons write Sabbath-school hymns, adding to the batch of infinite nonsense that the children are compelled to swallow. For others a beautiful curl is a corkscrew pulling out canto after canto. Nine-tenths of the rhyme that comes to a printing office cannot be used. You hear a rough tear of paper, and you look around to see the managing editor adding to the responsibilities of his chip-basket. What a way that is to treat incipient Tennysons and Longfellow!

Next to the poetic effusions tumble out treatises on "Constitutional Law" heavy enough to break the basket. We have noticed that after a man has got so dull he can get no one willing to hear him, he takes to profound exposition. Out from the same chip-basket rolls a great pile of announcements that people want put among the editorials, so as to save the expense of the advertising columns. They tell us the article they wish recommended will have a highly beneficial effect upon the Church and the world. It is a religious churn, or a moral horse-rake, or a consecrated fly-trap. They almost get us crying over their new kind of grindstone, and we put the letter down on the table while we get out our pocket-handkerchief, when our assistant takes hold the document and gives it a rip, and pitches it into the chip-basket.

Next in the pile of torn and upset-things is the speech of someone on the momentous occasion of the presentation of a gold-headed cane, or silver pitcher, or brass kettle for making preserves. It was "unexpected," "a surprise," and "undeserved," and would "long be cherished." "Great applause, and not a dry eye in the house," etc., etc. But there is not much room in a paper for speeches. In this country everybody speaks. An American is in his normal condition when he is making a speech. He is born with "Fellow citizens" in his mouth, and closes his earthly life by saying, "One word more and I have done." Speeches being so common, newspaper readers do not want a large supply, and so many of these utterances, intended to be immortal, drop into oblivion through that inexhaustible reservoir, the editorial chip-basket.

But there is a hovering of pathos over this wreck of matter. Some of these wasted things were written for bread by intelligent wives with drunken husbands trying to support their families with the pen. Over that mutilated manuscript some weary man toiled until daybreak. How we wish we could have printed what they wrote! Alas! for the necessity that disappoints the literary struggle of so many women and men, when it is ten dollars for that article, or children gone supperless to bed!

Let no one enter the field of literature for the purpose of "making a living" unless as a very last resort. There are thousands of persons to-day starving to death with a steel pen in their hand. The story of Grub street and poets living on thin soup, is being repeated all over this land, although the modern cases are not so conspicuous. Poverty is no more agreeable because classical and set in hexameters. The hungry author cannot breakfast on "Odes to Summer." On every winter day how many of the literati shiver? Martyrs have perished in the fire, but more persons have perished for lack of fire. Let no editor through hypercriticism of contributed articles, add to this educated suffering.

Crazy from Revivals.

A LEARNED physician in England gives as his opinion that religious awakenings are responsible for the dementation of many of the people. He says that persons are frequently in such a weak mental condition, that spiritual anxieties coming upon them cause aberration. Unless religion works differently on the other side of the water from the way it works here, we do not believe a word of the charge. Instead of enervating and unjointing the intellect, religion strengthens and gives beautiful equipoise. We can point you to a score of persons who were nerveless, insipid, and dull till religion put spunk and fire into them. The Bible lets us know that the first sane moment in the mind of the Prodigal Son was when he started for home: "He came to himself."

So we have divine authority for saying that instead of a man being made crazy by religion, the people are crazy who do not accept it.

There is nothing so adapted for improving the sanitary condition of the race as the Christian religion. Heaven is a state of eternal health, and conversion is the convalescence and recuperation necessary for admission. We therefore are willing to risk all the revivals that may come.

Making Wills.

FROM the law-suits now raging in the Orphan Courts we advise you to avoid the mistake of making your own "Last will and testament" unless you have great legal skillfulness. Better leave no will at all than one inefficiently constructed. The "Orphan's Court" could tell many a tragedy of property distributed adverse to the intention of the testator. You save twenty to a hundred dollars from your counsel by writing your own will, and your heirs pay ten thousand dollars to lawyers in disputes over it.

Perhaps those whom you have wished especially to favor will get the least of your estate, and a relative against whom you always had especial dislike will get the most, and your charities will be apportioned differently from what you anticipated—a hundred dollars to the Bible Society, and three thousand to the "Hook and Ladder Company."

"Good For Him."

HOW little sympathy for a man who misses his mark in life, and falls headlong! Where there is one person to help him up, there are a score to cry, "Good for him." There is a strange element in some natures that rejoices in the downfall of others. Men have the mistaken notion that over the shoulder of the defeated they themselves can climb to victory. No, no. You can gain nothing in life, but by hand-to-hand contest with obstacles in your own path. The failure of others will be no assurance of your success.

When you see a man fall, take it for granted that in the same circumstances and under the same pressure you would have done just as he did. It is unwise, ungenerous, and unchristian to say, "Good for him!"

BRIEF NOTES.

A few weeks ago we advertised for 25 names of Protestant Church men in return for which we offered to send "Lily of the Field" souvenir free to the person responding with a list. So 145 responses have been received that we now compelled to call a halt, our supply of "Lilies of the Field" having been entirely exhausted. Positively, no names need after July 20 will be accepted.

A Congregational Missionary in Madagascar writes that since the French occupation there has been "a great increase of drinking among Malagasy, as well as of licentiousness, and their now much Sunday trading in the capital, a thing which has not been known here for twenty years."

The Rev. Edward Davidson, the Wesleyan Connexion evangelist, speaking at Sheffield recently, gave a suggestive reminiscence showing how active was the life of a Methodist evangelist. He said that in the whole course of his ministry had never spent fourteen consecutive days at home and in ten years had slept in 530 beds.

Prince Oscar Bernadotte, second son of the King of Sweden and Norway, has a Sunday School for the children of the higher classes. Patriotic Frenchmen are deeply concerned about the facts revealed by recent statistics. "A terrible crime in France," says Mr. Soltan, of McAll Mission, "is alarmingly increasing, inasmuch that persons are being continually enlarged and French efforts are being increased and enlarged, beyond those of other European lands." The Republic is clearly not tending to morality.

The Presbyterian Women's Board of Foreign Missions has received a cable dispatch briefly announcing the death of Mrs. Roberts, who was stationed at Batanga, West Africa. She died of fever, from which her husband had only just recovered. She was one of the six new missionaries who went out two years ago. Her death has caused deep depression as it follows so closely on that of Mrs. Luffin, whose loss is still severely felt. Mr. Luffin's dying words were: "Tell the Church I send many more missionaries in my place."

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

The Wrecked Steamer.

FOREIGN mails now to hand, add little to the sad story brought by cable three weeks ago, of the wreck of The Drummond Castle. As was stated in the account published in these columns on June 13, it was hoped that some of the persons on board might have been saved, of whom no report had been received. The hope, however, was doomed to disappointment. It is now clear that only two persons—one passenger and two of the crew—survived out of the 253 persons on board. There were 148 passengers and 105 on the steamer when she went down. The three men succeeded, and several others on deck, in getting up of spars or gratings, but only one was held on till morning. How difficult it was to reach the grasp of the frail support in the boisterous sea around the fatal rocks, is well imagined. Mr. Marquardt, the only passenger saved, who, by the way, had at No. 13 on his voyage, says he during the hours he was lying before he was picked up he had a bitter struggle: "Every day and then I was caught in a net, then I was thrown, then I was carried upon me and taken off in another direction. I was at times within a hundred yards of land, when another current would drift me a mile or more from land. I do not know how I kept hold of my spar." The cause of the disaster is as mysterious as the rescue. That the captain should have taken a dangerous course intentionally, as is often cut, cannot be believed. It seems more probable that he was deceived as to the position. The currents around that part of the French coast are very strong. An officer of another vessel who has often sailed on the Bay of Biscay, says that on one of his voyages there was a drift toward the land of forty-five miles in twenty hours. The sailors who are saved from The Drummond Castle, admit that no soundings had been taken for two hours before the disaster. The captain may have been trusting to the sounding then taken and have forgotten the strength of the current. If so, it was a fatal oversight. The dangerous character of the coast is known to every seaman and should have induced the utmost caution. It was a terrible thing to be heedless in such circumstances, as it is about our way in every voyage of life. No man is safe in his life if he depends on a past experience. He must be continually vigilant. A world-blinded professor who thinks he is safe for heaven, because he believes that in his youth he was converted, may be as much mistaken as the captain was when he depended on the soundings taken two hours before the wreck. Even the Apostle Paul found it necessary as he tells us to be personally on his guard, lest, he says:

...that by any means, after I have preached to you, I myself should be a castaway. (1 Cor. 9:27.)

Search for a Mother.
A young man named James Deming arrived in New York from Ohio last week, if possible, to discover his mother. He says that his earliest recollections are of living with a number of other boys in an institution, which he believes to have been St. John's Home, Brooklyn. One day, while he was quite a little boy, a lady came to the Home and inquired for him. When he was pointed out to her she embraced him, and declared that she was his mother. She gave him a little money and told him that in a short time she should return and take him away to live with her. He looked anxiously for her every day afterward, but she did not come. After some time he was sent with seventy-five other boys, inmates of the Home, to the West to work on farms. He was moved from place to place, until while he was at work at some place in Ohio, he was told that the Society would give up control of him, and he must earn his own living. He drifted about the State for several years, working for any one who would employ him. But he had not forgotten the incident of his mother's visit. As soon as he could save sufficient money to return to the East he set out. Ekeing out his slender resources by walking and riding on freight cars he at last completed the journey. He induced one or two of the daily journals of New York to publish his portrait and the story of his life in the hope that his mother might see it and come to him. The hope cannot be a strong one. As she appears to have made but one effort to see him, and that many years ago, it would seem that even if she is living she is indifferent to him. It may be hoped that the young man will, in any case, find Christian friends who will urge him to seek his Heavenly Father, who has declared that his love for his children is stronger than a mother's.

He giveth power to the faint; and to them that have no might he increaseth strength. (Isa. 30:29.)

The Coming Eclipse.
Every successive eclipse of the sun raises expectancy of important results, as astronomers obtain by the aid of photography and the spectrum new facilities for increasing the precision of their observations. Prof. Young, of Princeton, has described in a New York journal, the preparations now being made by the leading astronomers of the world to observe the eclipse which will occur on Aug. 8. It will, it appears, be visible in Norway, Finland, Siberia and Japan and in each land a party of scientific men will watch the phenomenon. The eclipse will be total and so will give another opportunity of testing the nature of the Corona which is visible only in a total eclipse. Scientists are not agreed about this strange envelope which surrounds the great luminary. It is pearly white in color, brilliant near the sun's surface and gradually fading away with no distinct outline as it extends into space. It is believed to be five or six million miles in depth and streamers or filaments of various lengths stretch out from it to inconceivable distances. That it always surrounds the sun there is no doubt, but we cannot see its delicate light when the great orb is shining in its strength. When the sun is completely covered by the shadow of the moon, the corona with its strange streamers, becomes visible. It was once believed that the corona was merely an optical illusion, produced by our atmosphere, but the spectroscopic shows that it is an actual fact and that it contains a luminous gas peculiar to the sun, which does not exist on the earth. It also contains some element which gives dark lines in the spectrum and is thought to be composed of meteoric dust. The chief object of the expeditions of observation will be to gain further knowledge of the nature of this corona. Theologians have their mysteries, too, which like those of the astronomers are far from being solved. In spite of all their study they can tell us little of the nature of the Sun of Righteousness, which like the natural sun contains elements that are not found on earth. Of this, however, we have the assurance of eventually learning all by personal experience for,

We know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him: for we shall see him as he is. (1 John 3:2.)

A Race for a Life.

A Kentucky correspondent of the Philadelphia Times reports an exciting incident which occurred in one of the country towns of that State recently. He says that the Deputy Revenue Collector of the district had occasion to visit a neighboring city. He went to his home to make preparations before going to the railroad station. Before leaving his office he told his daughter, who acted as his clerk, to be careful to put the books and money in the safe before closing the office in the evening. The young lady's lover called shortly afterwards and assisted her in putting away the heavy ledgers, etc., in their receptacle. As a little joke he closed the door upon her when she was inside. In opening it again, he accidentally touched the combination and instantly the door was fast. The awful character of the situation burst on his mind. The only person who knew the combination, beside the girl, was her father, who in a few minutes would be whirling away as fast as the train could take him. His only chance of saving her life lay in the young man reaching the depot before the train left. It was a mile away, but he ran at his fastest speed. He reached it just as the train was starting, ascertained the combination and ran back as fast as he came. He was now able to open the safe-door and he found the girl still alive, though unconscious. She speedily recovered, and is no worse for her adventure. The young man must feel immensely relieved. The terror he must have endured while he made that mad race for her life is an experience he is never likely to forget. He will never play such a joke upon her again, but it will be well for them to remember that the time must come, sooner or later, when other gates will close upon her that no human power can open. She will be delivered then, too, if she has made her peace with her Heavenly Father through Him who has said:

I have the keys of hell and of death. (Rev. 1:18.)

A Dog Saves a Life.

A New York policeman was guided by a dog a few days ago to a case urgently in need of help. As he was patrolling his beat he heard a dog whining and when he reached a stone yard near the East River the dog ran out and jumped around him barking excitedly. The dog ran to and fro in the direction of the yard and so the policeman decided that an object of interest was inside. He followed the dog over heaps of stone to the far end of the yard. Finally, he stopped at two stones leaning against each other. He poked his nose into the cavity between them and barked and wagged his tail. The policeman looked in and, to his astonishment saw a baby wrapped in a piece of muslin. He took it up and carried it to the station house. It was left in charge of the matron who said that if it had been left out all night it would have died. The animal seems to have reasoned that as he could not save the child himself his best course was to go to the front of the yard and find some one that could save it. The Christian is sometimes in like circumstances. Seeing some one in danger of going to destruction and being unable to prevent it, he acts wisely if he makes his appeal to Christ who can save to the uttermost.

How long shall I be weary and longing for my Father to me. (Matt. 17:17.)

Cure for a Paralytic.

An extraordinary operation was performed at St. Luke's Hospital, New York, on July 9. A man was lying there who has been paralyzed since October last. He was then in Venezuela performing as an aeronaut. He used to make an ascension in a balloon and when he was about three thousand feet from the earth's surface, descend by means of a parachute. His last ascent was at a fête at Caracas. When he stepped out of the car of the balloon holding his parachute aloft, the parachute would not open. The cords of it were entangled. The man shot downward like a stone with fearful velocity. He struck the earth with a thud and lay in a heap as if dead. He was, however, still alive but horribly bruised and his limbs were dislocated. His dislocations were attended to in the hospital at Caracas and the man slowly recovered from his shock, but he was completely paralyzed from the waist down. Last month he was brought to New York and became a patient at St. Luke's. The surgeons there came to the conclusion that the paralysis was caused by the pressure of fragments of a part of the spine pressing upon the spinal marrow. An operation was performed and the broken fragments and a part of the spine removed. The result proved the correctness of the diagnosis. The man can now feel any touch of his lower limbs which before were perfectly cut off from sensation. The doctors think that in a short time he will be able to walk as well as ever. This wonderful cure has its parallel in the spiritual world. There are numbers of men now walking in the ways of the Lord and active in his service who once were dead to spiritual things and apparently incapable of doing good. When the Great Physician took their sin away they could serve him.

Little Kindnesses.

uggestions on the Christian Endeavor
Topic for the Week Beginning August 2.
Lu 7: 36-47.

WHAT a transformation there would be in this world, if every one were ready to do little kindnesses! If, instead of the surliness and selfishness which now show themselves in public life in the home, and sometimes in the church itself, there were sympathy, friendliness and the desire to promote the comfort and happiness of other people, how much brighter the world would be! Every one admits the fact, but it is not the desirable consummation, not a whit nearer. It is strange that it should be so, but the experience has proved the benefit of it in every life. There is no one who has not been comforted by the angry, unkind word, and has thus learned what a pang his own harsh speeches may inflict on the hearer. And then, too, we have the paradox the more selfish a man is by nature, the more reason he has to be kind to other people. There is no way which he can get more pleasure for himself than in giving pleasure to others. Like mercy, kindness blesses him who gives and the receiver. But the lesson is still the same and in spite of reason and experience, society is still everywhere in the condition of selfish association, where each is concerned for his own interest and cares nothing for the interests of his associates.

Christianity has not done so much to promote the spread of kindness as it should have done, nor as it might have been expected to do. Few people realize that kindness is a religious duty. Yet the derivation of the word proves this. It shows that the word comes from the old Saxon word, "to be kind," which means to behave to one as if he were kin to me, as if I were my kinsman. In our families that would not do for much. There are many in which the nice manner and the gentle words are expected of the visitors, and it is the wife and the sister who get the hard words. But the word means the natural expectation that however harsh and unfeeling a man may be to strangers, he will be good to those of his kindred. Now, Christianity teaches us to regard the whole world as kin to us, and to have a kindly feeling towards all men as if they were our kinsmen. At its entrance into the soul of a man it produces that effect. There is no surer proof of conversion than that a man can have the feeling of love for the one that springs up in his breast when he becomes a son of God. The divine nature implanted in him makes its influence felt. God is love and with God comes to dwell in the heart, his nature reproduces itself in the human nature. By and by, the old nature asserts itself and the influence of the world hardens and represses the new nature, unless more grace be sought and given. But the influence of Christianity—Christ in us—is essentially the influence of love. The fuller power it has, the less it is repressed, the more it pervades the life—just to that degree will the Christian be kind and loving. This fact is not realized as it should be. If the world is ever to be brought into God-likeness it must come in this way. What would be the effect if, say, the Christian Endeavor Society were to be of this spirit? What would be the result of two million persons, scattered through the world, bent on doing kindness at every opportunity? That would be a beginning of the most revolution ever inaugurated.

Answered Prayer.

I ASKED for bread; God gave a stone instead. Yet while I pillowed there my weary head, The angels made a ladder of my dreams, Which upward to celestial mountains led, And when I woke beneath the morning's beams, Around my resting place fresh manna lay; And, praising God, I went upon my way, For I was fed.

I asked for strength; for with the noontide heat I fainted, while the reapers, singing sweet, Went forward with the sheaves I could not bear. Then came the Master with his blood-stained And lifted me with sympathetic care. Then on his arms I leaned till all was done; And I stood with the rest at set of sun, My task complete.

I asked for light; around me closed the night, Nor guiding star met my bewildered sight, For storm-clouds gathered in a tempest near. Yet in the lightning's blazing, roaring flight, I saw the way before me, straight and clear. What though his leading pillar was of fire, And not the sunbeam of my heart's desire? My path was bright.

God answers prayer; sometimes when hearts are weak. He gives the very gifts believers seek. But often faith must learn a deeper rest, And trust God's silence when he does not speak; For he whose name is Love will send the best. Stars may burn out, nor mountain walls endure. But God is true, his promises are sure To those who seek.

The Two Witnesses.

The Identity and Character of the Two Mysterious Prophets of the Last Days.

BY MRS. M. BAXTER.*

THE two witnesses prophesy during that time which is spoken of as twelve hundred and sixty days, forty-two months and three and a half years—the time of the authority of Antichrist (Rev. 13: 5), the time of the sojourn in the desert of the sun-clothed woman.

Their prophesy in sackcloth. Unflinching they will be, men of righteousness and of judgment, on Old Testament lines. They do not show love to their enemies; the fire which proceeds out of their mouths devours any man who desireth to hurt them. Invincible in themselves during their days of prophecy, unflinching in their testimony, these men who, it would seem, prepare the way for the national conversion of Israel, witness as prophets during the whole three and a-half years of the Antichrist's reign. The question arises whether they are Moses and Elijah, who appeared in glory on the Mount of Transfiguration, or Enoch and Elijah, who have never yet died.

In the time of the prophet Zechariah, when the temple was rebuilt after the captivity, God had two men on his side on whom he could count, and whom he could use as his instruments: Joshua, the high priest (Zech. 3: 8, 9), who is spoken of as a type of Christ, and Zerubbabel, the governor (Zech. 4: 6-10),—these were the "anointed ones," or "sons of oil," of that day, "that stand by the Lord of the whole earth" (Zach 4: 14). In those days there was one candlestick, the Jewish Church; and the oil of God's grace flowed through these, his two witnesses of that day, to keep it alight.

Under the 5th and 6th trumpets, in the days of the great Antichrist, the seven candlesticks (Rev. 1: 19), will be shining no more: the overcomers will have been taken away to the throne; the Church will be hidden away in the wilderness. "Darkness shall cover the earth, and gross darkness the people" (Isa. 60: 2), in those days of awful terror. But God will have two men who will stand by him—two anointed ones, "two candlesticks," shining with an independent light when no outward church will be able to exist, all through that reign of fearful darkness. When the Antichrist shall compel all who dwell on earth to worship him (Rev. 13: 15-17), God, in his mercy, will keep a witness alive on earth.

Can we identify them? In the Book of Malachi (4: 5, 6) we read: "Behold, I will send you Elijah the prophet before the great and terrible day of the Lord come: And he shall turn the heart of the fathers to the children, and the heart of the children to their fathers:

lest I come and smite the earth with a curse." It is true that John the Baptist came "in the power and in the spirit of Elijah, to turn the hearts of the disobedient to the wisdom of the just; to make ready for the Lord a people prepared for him." (Luke 1: 17). But the Jews did unto him "whatever they liked." He did not, and could not, "restore all things," he did not, and could not, make ready a people prepared for the Lord, because the people only rejoiced in his light for a season, and did not accept his testimony of Christ.

QUESTIONS & ANSWERS

OUR MAIL-BAG.

No more lists of names can be received after July 20 for the "Lily of the Field" Souvenir.

The Poor Farm, Buxton, Me., and the South Carolina Penitentiary at Columbia, S. C., are both in need of religious reading matter. Any of our readers having suitable matter, can use it to the advantage of the cause by sending it prepaid, to the Superintendent of either institution.

Subscriber, Morris Plains, N. J. In your issue of April 8th, you state that Abbas II., the present Khedive, ascended the throne in January, 1892, on the death of his father, Tewfik. Who was Tewfik and did he succeed Ismail? What was the length of his reign? Why was the name "Prodigal" assigned to him?

Ismail abdicated in 1879, and was succeeded by Mohammed Tewfik I. (the son of a Circassian slave-wife of Ismail). Tewfik was a conscientious and faithful ruler, but unpopular among the natives who knew he was under the control of France and England. He died at the Helouin Palace, Cairo, Jan. 7, 1892, and his son, Abbas (born in 1874), succeeded him. The splendor of Ismail's Court, his retinue, and his surroundings, together with his great and costly public undertakings, caused him to be called "The Magnificent."

Rufus Smith, Maryville, Mo. 1. If our nation by law can stop the unkind treatment of animals, cannot all the civilized nations unite in saying to the Sultan and his government, "You must treat Armenians kindly or let them go?" 2. If some of the people in Norway could stop rum-sellers could we not in many places in the United States have the same success?

1. Undoubtedly; but the trouble is the "civilized nations" are not in accord. Theoretically, they all condemn the Turk and sympathize with Armenia; practically they consent to the atrocities by permitting them to go on unchecked. Every European nation is particeps criminis with Turkey in this matter. 2. It has been tried with success in some localities. The rum strongholds are the great cities, and until local and state legislation is thoroughly transformed by Christianity and none but upright men are chosen to carry out the laws, the evil will not be eradicated.

J. Rose, Newark, N. J. Is it true that there are now over two hundred Versions of the Bible printed and published?

According to the latest reports of the British Bible Society, the Bible is now printed in 381 languages—no less than 52 Versions having been added in the last five years; 42 by English and Scotch translators and Societies, and 5 by American Societies. At the beginning of this century the Word was printed in 38 languages only, as far as can now be ascertained. The first English Bible printed in the United States was issued in 1782.

W. E. H., Cordon, Minn. 1. Which of the two classes of people should be at the head of Temperance Societies: Christian who know the evils of intemperance, or worldly people who do not know the value of abstaining? 2. Was Samson in hell when he died for knowing the thirty Philistines to pay his wages?

1. Unquestionably the first-named class. If you wish to accomplish good work in behalf of Temperance, we would advise you to procure and scatter as widely as possible, Senator Blair's famous pamphlet on "The Temperance Reform," which we can send you for 5 cents, postage paid. 2. We must take history as we find it, without qualification. Those were rude early days, when but little value was apparently set upon human life. The whole episode to which you refer is in the nature of a punishment placed upon Samson for having sought a wife among the idolators, and his wife's faithlessness brings heavy loss upon herself and her kindred.

A. Turner, Pittsford, Ore. 1. How large is the Dead Sea? 2. How large is the Dead Sea where the Israelites wandered so long?

1. The Jordan varies in width from 100 to 150 feet, and is 130 feet wide at its mouth where it enters the Dead Sea. Its entire course, being tortuous and interrupted by many rapids, is about 200 miles in length. 2. The desert of Sinai (or Arabian Peninsula) measured in a straight line across does not exceed 200 miles and from the point where the Israelites entered the Red Sea southeast to Sinai, and thence northeast to a point opposite Jericho (as the "further side" of Jordan) the close of the wanderings, the distance in a straight line would not exceed 500 miles, but their circuitous route and the many changes of their wanderings, from the Red Sea to the Jordan, and thence to the land of Canaan, made their time of travel many times that distance.

D. J. Miller, Shipshewana, Ind. In his commandment, "Thou shalt not eat of the fruit of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil," what is the custom?

The custom of foot-washing before a meal was common in Palestine in our Lord's day. The country was hot and dusty, and sandals were worn which left the upper part of the foot exposed, the foot-washing was an act of necessary cleanliness and added to the comfort. It was usually performed for guests by a servant whose occupation was considered the most menial in the household. When the disciples were in the upper room the host appears to have considered the supply of a servant for the purpose as no part of his contract. The disciples, therefore, had to do the duty for each other, or sit down with it undone. As they had just been disputing which of them was the greatest there was none willing to surrender his claim to greatness by taking the servant's duty. Christ observed the omission, knew the cause and as a practical object lesson in humility took the duty upon himself. His commandment, therefore, was in the line of his teaching. They were to be ever ready to follow his example in rendering service to the brethren. It was an illustration of a lesson he had inculcated often and in that sense was consequently not a new commandment.

C. D., Hoboken, Pa. 1. Did Christ have any sisters or brothers? 2. Why was Peter surnamed Simon, and why was he like a stone?

1. The "brothers" of Jesus named in Scripture, were James, Joseph, Simon, and Judas (See Matt. 12: 46; Matt. 13: 55, John 2: 12, and 7: 3, 5, and 10; Acts 1: 14; Gal. 1: 19; I. Cor. 9: 5, and Mark 6: 3. They are all named conjointly with the mother of Jesus and with Joseph. There have been many disputations as to whether they were "full" brothers to Jesus, by the same parents, or the sons of Joseph by a former marriage, and therefore, half-brothers only, and this view was strongly urged by some of the early Church writers. Still another opinion was that expressed by Jerome and others that they were the sons of Mary, Jesus' mother's sister (See John 19: 25), as she is distinctly said to have sons named James and Joseph (See Acts 1: 13 and Matt. 27: 56). Sisters of Jesus are also mentioned in Matt. 15: 36; Mark 6: 3, and Mark 3: 32, but the last-named passage is of doubtful authority. Their names are not given. 2. The son of Jonas was originally named Simon, and being of firm and steadfast character, Jesus gave him as an apostle, the name of Peter, which signifies a rock.

J. E. McQueen, Big Run, Pa. Where along the line of surrender is the blood of Christ applied to the soul for the remission of sin?

We do not understand your question, nor does it seem important. The promise is given to all who put their trust in Christ and confess him, that their sins are forgiven. We are assured that the sins committed after conversion are washed away by his blood. More than that we do not need to know. We have to take the offer made to us and to take it in faith. Why the shedding of blood was necessary to the remission of sins, and how and when it is applied are mysteries which we cannot fathom. The fact is sufficient.

"Reader," Lakeport, N. H. Who was the founder of the Roman Catholic Church?

Catholic writers claim that the history of that church began with the life of the Saviour on the earth, that he personally organized it with Peter as its head, and that Peter exercised episcopal powers. Impartial historians, however, are agreed that the Papal Church, as it is now known, did not come into existence until the close of the eighth century, when, what had till then been merely an episcopacy, was converted into a papal church, and its temporal power established, and the claim of "divine" asserted, Gregory VII. being the first incumbent who represented the new system, and being, therefore, in a sense, the founder of the Roman Church.

D. B., Tinsicula, Pa. What opportunities are afforded for visiting Mont-Lawn and other places in New York? THE CHRISTIAN HERALD tells us of?

There are ample facilities for sightseers in New York and environs. To visit Mont-Lawn (30 miles distant, at Nyack-on-the-Hudson,) one can either go by river or by rail. The maroon will make you welcome. Parties of visitors go there frequently and take a deep interest in our Fresh Air work.

James J. O'Hara, Waldo, Kan., and E. Moulden, Memphis, Tenn., and others. Whom did Cain marry?

You have all the information in the book of Genesis that is available. Various traditions are in existence but none of them is reliable. If you believe the Scriptural account that Adam and Eve were the first human beings and were a new creation, you must see that you have no alternative but to believe that Cain married his sister, whose birth is not mentioned in the inspired narrative.

Mr. J. T. Robbins, Me. 1. What is the meaning of the words in John 21: 25? 2. It is possible for any one who uses intoxicating liquors habitually to be a Christian? 3. What can be the reason of a minister preaching for more than a year without seeing one person brought to Christ? 4. Is it as wrong to call a person foolish as to call him "Thou fool?" (See Matthew 5: 22.)

1. That the world would not contain the books in the sense of receiving or being influenced by them. Sufficient was set down for the purpose which the Evangelist had in view of convincing men of the divinity of Christ. More would have made the books too voluminous to be easily studied. 2. Yes, do not be eager to judge or condemn other people. Some conscientious Christians use intoxicating liquor, though we wish every Christian thought, as we do, that it is a duty to abstain for the sake of others. 3. If we knew the circumstances we might be able to answer. Perhaps it is the fault of the minister or the fault may be with his church. His people may be captious or hard-hearted. Perhaps his church does not pray for him or the members may be so repelling that no one cares to connect himself with them. 4. The expression to which Christ referred implied wicked perversity rather than the lack of understanding to which we give the name foolishness. "Thou fool," is an abusive expression more offensive than "you are foolish."

C. L. P., Eugene, Ore. 1. Who were the spirits in prison mentioned in I. Peter 3: 19? 2. Who are the witnesses referred to in Revelations 12?

1. The explanation now generally accepted is that they were the Antediluvians to whom Christ preached through his spirit in Noah. As a minister might say, referring to one who after setting under his preaching had committed a crime and been sent to prison, that he had preached to the man in prison, meaning that the man now in prison had heard him preach, not that the minister had been to the prison and preached to him there. The passage is difficult, and this explanation by no means wholly satisfactory, but it appears to be the only alternative to the still greater difficulty of believing that Christ preached in the realm of the impenitent dead. 2. The two divinely inspired men who are to witness for Christ during the reign of Antichrist: the end of this dispensation, and will suffer martyrdom. They are to be miraculously rescued to life after three and a-half days. Some commentators believe that they will be Enoch and Elijah, the only two men who are recorded to have escaped death.

A. B., Corning, N. Y. Justin Martyr, in his Apology to the Emperor, tells him to read the Acts of Pontius Pilate. Is there such a book as a record of ancient history, in existence now, or if so what does it say of the trial and crucifixion of Christ and where can the book be found?

It is not unreasonable to assume that there was an official record of the acts of Pilate, Procurator, and that it recorded among other matters, the trial and the surrender of Christ to the multitude. This record, or some of it, may have been in existence in the centuries of the Christian era, and accessible to the early Christian writers and theologians, but like almost everything else in the realm of official records it has long since disappeared, possibly having been destroyed in some of the numerous wars that disturbed Palestine.

Lula Venable, Springfield, Ark. When, where, and by whom was the first Sunday school organized?

It is impossible to say whether children were gathered for instruction on Sunday somewhere at early periods; but it is certain that the Sunday School which was the basis of our present system was that organized about 1784 at Gloucester, England, by Robert Raikes, a printer of that city. He was concerned at seeing the number of neglected children and employed four teachers to give them instruction.

"Inquirer," Otter Creek, Mich. Was it right to fight for God for a man to have more wives than one in David's time, any more than it is now?

The revelation of God's will has been progressively. There were many things permitted to ancient Israel which it would be wrong for us to do. The Mosaic law permitted polygamy but made it so onerous by enjoining restrictions and duties upon the polygamist as to discourage it. In the providence of God we soon learned that polygamy and even bigamy usually involved jealousy and sorrow and made the man's life miserable. Nearly all the instances recorded led to misery. David did many things which were wrong. The Israelites are not intended to be examples of us in everything. (See Mark 10: 4-6, 17: 30.)

H. M., Nantucket, Mass. Would it be right for a member, say, of a Presbyterian Church, to be baptized by immersion and commune with other churches, without being a member of either?

There would be an advantage in it, in the way of escaping responsibility and avoiding onerous duties. You would, however, lose many opportunities of rendering service, your example would not be so beneficial if you joined a church. The Christian should not always make his own comfort the supreme consideration, but should study in what way he can do most good, and best promote the interests of his Master's kingdom. In a campaign a soldier who did not wish to be enlisted in any regiment would be regarded as lacking in patriotism and proper military spirit. Do not think the Presbyterians would exclude you for being baptized by immersion, but they did cast you out, the Baptists would receive you and you could get and do good among them. Do not be a religious vagrant.

E. M., Peebles, Avondale. Is not the real reason why the first day of the week is now observed as the Sabbath, instead of the seventh day, that Satan desired to get God's memorial out of sight and so he induced people to observe a feigned day than the one appointed?

We do not think that is the reason. That we read about Satan in the Bible indicates that he has more sense. His usual course is to get people to be very scrupulous about observing the letter of God's commandments and to violate the spirit of them. The Pharisees who complained of Christ's breaking Sabbath were people after Satan's own heart. If he had anything to do with the change the day and the character of its observance he must ere this have deplored his interference. He must have found the spirituality of the Christian on the Lord's Day more detrimental to his interests than a day spent in Sabbatic rest. It must also be distressing to him to see how all Christians show honor to its Lord by celebrating a day on which he rose from the dead. He must feel every Sunday as the French feel when the Germans celebrate the anniversary of Sedan. Christ's resurrection was the severest blow Satan's kingdom ever received.

THE BOOK SHELF

The Lost Wanderer Found.*

ONE day in the second spring after Rob had gone away, the first and last news of the wanderer came to Stanerigg, brought by the old one-eyed postman, Willie Chisholm, who had often wondered whether he could be privileged to bear some message from across the seas to the desolate home.

I did not see the mistress that day, to his disappointment, and it was Ailie Dyer who took in the little package and the letter bearing the stamp of the Republic. The mistress took them tremblingly, and sat down at the open window, fumbling in her pocket for her spectacle-case, which was a new possession to which she had hardly yet got accustomed. And it happened that at the moment Stanerigg himself came in, and she bade him falteringly sit in the door.

"The news has come, an' it's no Rob's coming. I'm feart to open it. Tak the letter first, faither."

I took it from her, and, quite unconsciously of what he was doing, knelt down before her so that he could open the letter over her knee. And they made a pathetic scene, the father and mother whose grief had aged before their time, the soft April sun playing with their gray hairs and coloring the flush of excitement on their cheeks. It was a short letter written by the old man of a Methodist Church in a little township situated among the distant prairies of Iowa, and it ran thus:

"CARTERVILLE, March 30th.

"MADAME: It is my sad duty to write to you concerning your son, Robert Gray, whom I called a long distance to see yesterday, to find him dying of a severe attack of inflammation of the lungs, contracted through exposure in one of the most terrible blizzards we have had for many years. I had not met him before, as the place where he has been working as hired man is thirteen miles from my home, and difficult of access. I think he had been there for about ten months, working for a decent, well-to-do German Jew, to whom he has given the greatest satisfaction, being sober, industrious, and of amiable disposition. I was grieved to find him so weak to say much, but he was able to write a little about himself, and to instruct me to carry out his last wishes. He had been working about a good deal, as young men do out here without introduction or acquaintance; but so far as I could gather, he had never been in any sore straits, though sometimes in rather low water. I was surprised to find him possessed of a university training, though, indeed, I have met many such instances. He did not detail to me his reasons for having left a home so comfortable and happy, and the memory of which he cherishes so passionately that I was quite overcome. One thing you may take to comfort you that he has not been living a prodigal's life here, but the reverse. He was reserved about his own state of mind, but told me quite frankly he had no fear of death. He asked me to send you the inclosed package, which I have not opened, but which he told me he had carried within his vest next his heart during the last two years. I remained with him till his death, which was painless and beautiful, and I assure that you may with the utmost confidence look forward to a happy reunion in a world where these sorrows are unknown. I regret that my letter must of necessity be meagre and unsatisfactory, as I only saw him once. He has been buried in a little cemetery near the farm on which he died. His employer defrayed the whole expenses, and all the neighbors turned out, showing that he was a general favorite. If there is anything further you would like to know, pray write, and I will do my best to reply. Meantime, with sincere Christian sympathy, I remain, madame, Yours faithfully,

"ABIRAM MORSE."

They were able to read the letter through which that wondrous self-control which had distinguished them throughout, and to open the string and cut the wrappings which held their boy's legacy to them. There was no letter. Within lay a little New Testament with brass clasps which his mother had given him on the day he first went to church. The clasps were intact, but would not close over something bulky within—a thick roll of dollar bills. They fell upon her lap, and then the book seemed to open naturally where lay the sprig of ivy, now dry and faded, which had once been living green on the gable end of the home at Stanerigg. On that open page two passages were deeply underlined—a message from the unseen to those who had now no child:

"Forasmuch as ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold; . . . but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot."

And again: "Behold, we count them happy which endure. . . . The Lord is very pitiful, and of tender mercy."

By what tortuous ways that wandering soul had returned to the fold they would never know; and though the hand of God seemed heavy upon them, they were not without their crumbs of comfort. Stanerigg bowed his head, now so nearly white, on his wife's knee, and a great sobbing shook him, like the wind of winter in the trees. But she sat still and quiet, with a wondering and deep light in her meek, sweet eyes, conscious for the moment that the veil between the seen and the unseen was so thin that her sharpened vision could almost pierce it. Her life during the past two years had been one long prayer, and lo! the sore travail of her soul had its answer—her boy was safe. Being thus assured, she could wait for Daybreak and the light of heaven. So, tranquilly, she is waiting still.

The Matabele Uprising.

THE war begun by the natives against the British in Matabeleland, Africa, may assume formidable proportions. Skirmishes are of constant occurrence, and although the Matabele cannot be made to face a regular engagement, they have made a very strong showing in some of the encounters around Bulawayo. It is their custom to fall back whenever a formidable white force opposes them, and, on the latter relaxing its efforts, to immediately resume their harassing tactics. They are especially strong in the vicinity of the Umgusa River, at the Lower Insiza, and among the Matopopo hills.

Our illustration on the opposite page (which is reproduced from a recent number in the London Illustrated News), shows a peculiar-looking fort, which has been constructed in the outskirts of Bulawayo, by the British, for the purpose of protecting the friendly natives. A force of soldiers is posted in it, and as it is a sort of crow's nest, built in a tree, they can command a view of the country for miles around, and thus troops can be dispatched quickly to any quarter where raiding parties of Matabele are operating. It is a common experience to see an armed band of the enemy come over the hills, steal the cattle and drive them from the plains back to the mountains, keeping up a constant fusillade meanwhile. A number of these raiding parties have been discovered by the sentries at the fort, and overtaken and punished.

CONDEMNING THE TURK.

The special commissioner sent to Armenia by the Duke of Westminster's Committee to report on the present condition of Armenia has returned. He declares his conviction that there is no hope for the Armenians "unless the Governments of Europe join together and insist upon placing these provinces under European control, and giving security for life and property. Then, and then only, can permanent relief be given."

The Living Dead.

deliverance from terrible torments. Little by little by soul appealed in the strong prayer. My view was changing, and I now looked upon the horrors of a slow death in the grave, as a merited punishment. I gave myself up to the Lord's will and prayed only for the remission of my sins.

In this frame of spirit I was in the evening, when the last service was held. The last hymn was sung, and the people raised me with my coffin. In doing so they shook me up, and at the same moment a sigh escaped me without any effort on my part. One man said to another: 'It seemed that I heard the dead man sigh.' 'No,' answered the other, 'it only seemed so to you; it is impossible.'

"But my chest was freed by the spasm which had disturbed it, and I began to groan loudly. Everybody rushed to me, and the doctor rapidly loosened my uniform, put his hand on my heart and exclaimed with great surprise: 'The heart beats! He is breathing! He is alive! It is a wonderful case.'

"I was quickly transferred from the coffin to my bedroom, was undressed, put in the bed, and rubbed with some kind of spirit. Soon I opened my eyes and my first look fell on a picture of my Saviour, the same (as I knew afterward) that had been near the bolster of my coffin. Torrents of tears poured from my eyes, and thus relieved my heart.

"I spent a few days in absolute seclusion, during which I did not see any strange face. My consolation and my soul's nourishment were David's Songs. From them I learned to know and to love the Lord.

"My first act, after recovery, was to partake of the Holy Sacrament. Pastor M—, an experienced teacher in spiritual affairs, was my adviser. He strengthened my desire to renounce the world and worldly attachments; but it took time to arrange everything. My first deed in that direction was to refuse the honor of becoming the son-in-law of a notable prince and the husband of a beautiful princess. Then I resigned from the Guards, freed my slaves, and sold my furniture and horses, and found a use for this money in doing good to others. My entailed properties I gave away to my lawful heirs. So I spent a year. At last, comparatively free from worldly cares, I resolved to devote the rest of my life to the Master's service.

"I have served him ever since, through all these years, and am now finishing my days. I freed my faithful Stepan, and wanted to give him money enough for his old age, but he did not take the money, and did not even want his liberty. With tears he begged me not to send him away. 'I am still a poor sinner, not worthy to be a servant of Jesus,' said Stepan; 'it is grace enough to be permitted to live with the Lord's chosen people.' He wanted to be with me, and he died in my care."

The aged narrator finished his strange history with the following pious words: "In me you behold the wonderful work of the Lord's mercy. In order to save my soul, I was permitted to go through apparent death, and while I lay in the garments of the grave, he opened my spiritual eyes so that I might live forever in the future life." A Remarkable Convention.

Bryan and Sewall Nominated by the Free Silver Democracy for President and Vice-President.

HERE is little doubt that the Democratic National Convention, which was held in Chicago, July 9, 10 and 11, will pass into history as one of the memorable gatherings of an exceedingly active political age. The movement in the West, in support of free silver, which played so prominent a part in the Republican and Prohibition National Conventions, held several weeks ago (whose proceedings, with biographical sketches of the candidates were published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD at the time), had already assumed formidable proportions in the Democratic ranks, and long before the date fixed for the Chicago Convention it was foreshadowed that the battle between the gold and silver wings of the party would be a bitter one. This forecast was verified at the very opening of the proceedings when the Convention met. In the preliminary organization, the Free Silver men demonstrated their strength by substituting Senator Daniel, of Virginia, as Temporary Chairman, in the place of Senator Hill, of New York, who had been the choice of the National Democratic Committee. The permanent organization was also controlled by the Free Silver wing, and in several states where there were contesting delegations the Committee on Credentials seated the Free Silver delegates.

When the Committee on Resolutions reported, the first great struggle of the Convention took place. There were two reports, that of the minority representing the causes of the dissent from the Free Silver platform reported by the majority, and declaring that the experiment of Free Silver coinage and a change in the existing standard of value would imperil our national finances, retard the establishment of international bimetalism, disturb business, impair contracts, diminish the purchasing power of the wages of labor and injure our national commerce generally. The minority also declared in favor of the rigid maintenance of the existing gold standard, and that paper currency be kept at a parity with gold. This report was signed by the representatives of the States of New York, Wisconsin, Delaware, Maryland, New Hampshire, Maine, Vermont, Connecticut, Rhode Island, Michigan, Minnesota, Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, South Dakota and New Jersey—these representing the "gold wing" of the party. The majority report, as finally adopted as the platform of the Convention, denounces the silver demonetization act of 1873, declares monometallism to be un-American, and demands "the free and unlimited coinage of both silver and gold at the present legal value of 16 to 1, and that the standard silver dollar shall be a full legal tender equally with gold, for all debts public and private." It condemns the issuing of interest-bearing government bonds in times of peace, and also condemns the issuance of national bank notes on the ground that the government alone should issue and control our legal tender. It condemns the McKinley tariff act and arraigns the U. S. Supreme Court for its adverse decision on the income tax. These are the leading features in the platform, which deals with a number of other topics as well.

The platform was not adopted without a strong protest from the gold men. Many earnest speeches were delivered, the most notable on the gold side being that of Senator Hill, the chosen spokesman of the minority, and ex-Congressman William Jennings Bryan, of Nebraska, for free silver. The brilliant oratory of the latter took the convention by storm, eclipsing that of Tillman, Altgeld and others who had preceded him in the advocacy of the new political doctrine. Until he ascended the platform to address the Convention he had hardly been heard of in that vast gathering. Yet a single speech, or rather a single remarkable sentence, served to bring him into prominence and make him the choice of the Convention. In his peroration, speaking of the demand for the gold standard, he said: "You shall not press down upon the brow of labor this crown of thorns. You shall not crucify mankind upon a cross of gold." This language fired the Convention, which stamped for him, and in the subsequent voting he was nominated on the fifth ballot, defeating Bland of Missouri, Boies of Iowa, Pattison of Pennsylvania, McLean of Ohio, Teller of Colorado, and several other candidates. For Vice-President, Arthur Sewall, of Maine, was nominated on the fourth ballot. Throughout the Convention, both on the question of adopting the platform and on the balloting, the delegates from all the "gold" States declined to vote.

William Jennings Bryan, the nominee for President, was born in Illinois in 1860. He received an academic education, studied law and began practice at Jacksonville, removing in 1887 to Lincoln, Neb., where he became a member of the law firm of Talbot & Bryan. He was nominated by the Democrats and elected to Congress in 1890 from the First Nebraska District, and again in 1892. In 1894 he was defeated for United States Senator. Since that time he has been an active speaker in different parts of the Union in behalf of free silver, and is regarded as one of the ablest orators that cause has yet placed in the field. Mr. Bryan has his home at Lincoln, with his wife and three children—two daughters and a son. He is a man of intense earnestness, with a strongly intellectual face. As a debater he is said to have few equals. Mr. Sewall, the Vice-Presidential nominee, is a native of Bath, Me., and comes of Revolutionary stock. He is largely interested in shipping, railways, banking and iron-works, and is reported to be very wealthy.

The "gold" Democrats, who were defeated in the Convention, are yet undecided what policy to pursue. There is talk of holding a "bolting" convention, and nominating a second Democratic candidate on a "sound money" platform.

What Touched His Heart?

It is related that on an occasion when a brilliant speaker was once addressing a religious gathering, there was present a young man for whose conversion friends had prayed long and earnestly. The speaker was wonderfully effective that evening, and his audience was strangely stirred. There was a brief testimony meeting at the close of the address, and when a call for converts was made the young man mentioned came forward and knelt at the altar. "It was Mr. B.'s wonderful talk that brought you to take this step, wasn't it?" asked one of the young man's friends afterwards. "No, it was not," he replied. "What was it, then?" "It was what poor old Mrs. Crane said." "Mrs. Crane?" "Yes; I've known her for years. She has had poverty and sorrow all of her life, and when she got up and said so quietly and simply, 'I love God, and thank him for all his goodness and mercy to me,' I knew that she meant every word of it. I don't know just how or why it was, but I suddenly had an overpowering conviction of my own sin and ingratitude—I who have always been well and strong and happy. Something in poor old Mrs. Crane's simple words impressed me as I have never before been impressed. It may have been because of their absolute sincerity. I longed for the love she spoke of. I believe that I owe my conversion to her more than to any other earthly agency."

Sustained in Death.

To one who observed Archbishop Whately's sufferings and asked him if he suffered much pain during his last hours on earth, he said: "Some time ago I should have thought it great pain, but now I am enabled to bear it." His intellect was unclouded by illness. He could think and speak. Some one said to him, "You are dying as you have lived, great to the last." The reply was, "I am dying as I lived, in the faith of Jesus." Another said, "What a blessing your glorious intellect is unimpaired." He answered, "Do not call intellect glorious; there is nothing glorious out of Christ!" Another said, "The great fortitude of your character supports you." "No, it is not the fortitude of my character which supports me, but my faith in Christ." With such a witness on his lips and in his acts, Archbishop Whately passed away.

Requests for Prayer.

the Converts' Sunday Afternoon Prayer Meeting at the Bowery Mission was offered on July 5, in accordance with the requests of many persons among whom the following ask the prayers of our readers:

For the Conversion of "Anxious Mother and Sister," Glen Mills, Pa., praying that a near and dear one who has resisted the Holy Spirit, and is now yielding to intemperance may be saved. "Anxious Mother," that her children and the father might all be brought to Jesus and made new creatures in him. "Subscriber," Quebec, Can., for the salvation of an aged father, a brother, a sister and a dear friend who are all out of Christ, and the last named one who has been prejudiced against religion by the inconsistencies of its professors. "Anxious Mother," California, that a dear daughter, who has been led away by false promises, and is in danger of losing her reason, find peace in Christ, and give herself wholly to him. Prayer offered for her somewhat at the Bowery Mission was answered, and she is now again very urgent; also for another daughter who is seeking Christ, and cannot find rest in him. "Sister," Randolph, O., that two brothers may be delivered from the curse of strong drink and be made sons of God. "F. M. W., Viola, Ill., that a young man who spends his Sundays in unholiness might be convinced of his sin, and led to seek the Lord, and that his unbelieving father and his wayward brother might both become Christians. "Believer," New York, for the conversion of a brother who is yielding to renounce intemperate habits. "Anxious Sister," Sterling, Ill., that two brothers and two sisters who do not know the Lord might be led to love and serve him. "Reader," Erie, Colo., that four friends, who might do good work for the Lord if they were his servants, may be converted. "Ever in Prayer," that a wayward son may learn to walk in the way of righteousness. "Subscriber," Philadelphia, on behalf of a converted brother for whom many prayers have been offered, but who firmly resists all appeals, and is now gradually yielding to appetite for strong drink. His conversion is urgently desired. "Believer," Marine, Tex., who prays earnestly for the persons named every week in these columns, now for the prayers of others for a son who is in danger of going astray through drink that God would save his soul and keep him from sin. "Reader," New York, for the conversion of a whole family who are all out of the Kingdom. "One Who Believes," Norman, Conn., that a dear friend, now in bitter trouble and in danger of losing his reason, may find his heart to God, and be kept by divine power from all evil. "Firm Believer," Ill., that her two boys, who are led away through strong drink and card-playing, might be saved and made new creatures in Christ. "Reader," Spencer, O., that the only son of Christian parents may give his heart to God and that two sons-in-law, who have Christian wives, may give themselves to the Lord. "Reader," Springville, Pa., for the sought conversion of three brothers and the families, and of two sons, and one son-in-law, none of whom have as yet yielded themselves to Christ. "L. L., Sunshine," that her children might be brought into the fold of God. "Sorrowing Mother," Spencer, O., for the salvation of a daughter, who does not realize her need of Christ, and of a son who leads a good moral life, but is not a Christian, but especially of a son for whose conversion she has been praying for twenty years, yet who is still unsaved, and is subject to riotous outbreaks of intemperance to the intense grief of his friends. "Reader," N. J., Can. for the conversion of a person in advanced age, who sadly needs the assurance of salvation; also of one who is interested in divine things, but has not yet yielded to the Saviour. "Believer," Rockwood, Pa., that her husband who needs God's grace to be him in the path of peace, may be led to himself wholly to Christ. "G. A. B., Elk Neck, Md., that God would bring all her children into the glorious light and peace of above; also that an aged father might find peace in Christ even in the eleventh hour. "Subscriber," Gainesville, that the mother of two dear children might become a child of God; that she may have grace to bring them up in the fear of the Lord. A. L. G., Stanton, Tenn., for the conversion of a son-in-law, who has deserted his family, and is causing them great anxiety.

For the Restoration of Health. "Reader," New York. That two members of a family who are very ill and are losing their sense of hearing may recover through God's healing power. "Anxious mother," that her children now passing through a dangerous disease may be spared to her. A. H., Hartford, Vt., for the recovery of a dear sister who has long been a sufferer from throat and lung troubles. D., St. Paul, Minn., that one who is affected with nervous disease, which causes cerebral disturbance, may be healed of the Lord. R. M. F., Adamsville, W. Congo Cannibals.

The Rev. Mr. Ruskin recently visited a tribe on the Lopori river, a branch of the Congo, hitherto untouched by the Gospel. His account is a thrilling one. He found the people cannibals of the most degraded type, living in constant feuds with the Arabs and other foes. "We welcome war," they said; "because it brings us meat. We eat all enemies slain in battle." Hunting for animals is unknown; but every few weeks these savages go out in search of human food. One day Mr. Ruskin received a formidable visit. A band of warriors appeared, tattooed and fully armed, with the king at their head, his eyes smeared with black powder, to indicate that he was angry and came prepared to fight. God preserved his servant.

Have You Asthma or Hay-Fever?

Medical science at last reports a positive cure for Asthma and Hay-fever in the wonderful Kola Plant, a botanical discovery found on the Congo River, West Africa. Its cures are really marvelous. R. J. L. Combs, of Martinsburg, W. Va., writes that he cured him of Asthma of fifty years' standing. John L. G. Clute, of Greeley, Iowa, testifies that for three years he had to sleep propped up in a chair in Hay-fever season, being unable to lie down night or day. The Kola Plant cured him at once. To the matter sure, these and hundreds of others are sworn to before a notary public. So great is their faith in its wonderful curative powers, the Kola Importing Co., of 1164 Broadway, New York, to make it known is sending out large cases of the Kola compound free to sufferers from Asthma and Hay-fever. All they ask in return is that when cured they will tell your neighbors about it. Send your name and address on a postal card, and they will send you a large case by mail free. WITHIN the recollection of the present generation, a great change has taken place in the morale and discipline of the navies of the globe. Formerly a man-of-war's man was of little account, save as he was strong and able at his work on board ship and lucky in a fight. The office of chaplain—when the vessel was fortunate enough to have one at all—was not particularly burdened with spiritual cares for the men's welfare, and Jack himself, both afloat and ashore, was anything but a paragon of the virtues. Rum, tobacco, cards, dancing and music furnished all the enjoyment he cared for, and the absence after a long sea voyage usually spent in dissipation, the poor returning to his ship with empty pockets, aching limbs and a heart full of regrets. Lives so spent had but one consequence—if the sea spared the sailor, he then found himself at mid-life a used, rheumatic, prematurely old man, fit to do some light work ashore or to life and a higher manhood. Spiritual work is becoming more of a feature on our naval vessels than ever before and there is hardly a port of any considerable size here or in Europe which has not at least one Sailors' Mission where the seamen off duty can hear the Gospel and have the benefit of associating and advising with men who are devoting their lives to evangelical work among this neglected class.

H. H. CLARK, CHAPLAIN.

Sunday on board a United States man-of-war is in many respects similar to any other day in the week, save that the men are more quiet, the occasional games and recreations are suspended, there are no drills, and the morning "church" is the important feature of the day. The last-named is among the most beautiful and impressive services held on board the principal vessels of the American Navy. The congregation meets on the gun-deck, about midships, at 10:30 a. m., and is ligious services presents an interesting scene. At one end the Chaplain stands at his pulpit—a solid oak piece of furniture, draped with the Stars and Stripes—on which rests the open Bible. To the right, the officers of the ship are seated, and facing the Chaplain are the marines, in uniforms of white duck, with blue sailor collars. To the left, the rear of a powerful gun is visible, the muzzle projecting through a port-hole, while to the right, and back of the officers, a rack of rifles may be seen. Here, amid the deadly weapons of mod-lect this privilege. The government provides a Chaplain, and designates the hour for service, but does not compel the men to attend, so that it is very encouraging to find a large proportion of the ship's men at the Sunday morning service.

A beautiful custom in the Navy in this connection, is that when the ship's bell tolls for church, the national colors are hauled down from the peak, and the church pennant, consisting of a blue cross on a white field, is displayed instead. The colors are then hauled back to a position immediately underneath the pennant. Thus the sacred symbol of Christianity alone is permitted to take precedence of the Stars and Stripes, and this, the only flag that is ever hoisted above the national colors, remains flying during the hour of Sunday worship, from half-past ten until half-past eleven. It is then hauled down and the U. S. S. NEW YORK.

Stars and Stripes are again hoisted. Every flagship in the Navy carries a chaplain, and most of the first-raters, such as the Columbia and Memphis. Some of the second-raters, like the Texas and Maine, also have chaplains. Every prominent Naval Station and Navy Yard is also provided with a chaplain, so that in the Navy the government provides in all for twenty-four chaplains, who at the time of their appointment must not be over thirty-five nor less than twenty-one years of age.

There are few finer fields for personal Christian work, for the duties of a naval chaplain have a great deal of promise, if he be a man full of consecration and zealous for the spiritual well-being of the seamen. Such a chaplain wins and holds the love and respect of all on board. Our naval chaplains represent different leading religious denominations, among them be-largely made up of the officers and crew, the gunners and marines. Usually the services are solemn and impressive, and are listened to with reverent attention by the men.

On board the New York, the flagship of the North Atlantic Squadron, the Rev. H. H. Clark, D.D., Chaplain of the Navy, officiates at "morning church." The services last about an hour, and a deep interest is taken in the responses from the book of prayer, as well as in the sermon and singing, music for which is furnished by the Admiral's band.

This quarter of the gun-deck, during re-en warfare, this body of men assemble to lift up their hearts and voices to their Maker.

Only war or the stress of a severe storm is allowed to interfere with "church." The average attendance is about one hundred and fifty when at sea, and from fifty to seventy-five when the ship is in port, this decrease being due to the fact that a number of the men are ashore on leave-of-absence. Sunday on board ship is resting-day for nearly all hands, and those who are inclined to attend divine worship, do so of their own free will. It is to the credit of our seamen that very few of them neg-

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

WHO WAS YOUR FATHER?

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: 1. Samuel 17: 58: "Whose son art thou, thou young man?"

NEVER was there a more unequal fight than that between David and Goliath. David five feet high; Goliath ten. David a shepherd boy, brought up amid rural scenes; Goliath a warrior by profession. Goliath a mountain of braggadocio; David a marvel of humility. Goliath armed with an iron spear; David armed with a sling with smooth stones from the brook. But you are not to despise these latter weapons. There was a regiment of slingers in the Assyrian army, and a regiment of slingers in the Egyptian army, and they made terrible execution, and they could cast a stone with as much accuracy and force as now can be sent shot or shell. The Greeks in their army had slingers who would throw leaden plummets inscribed with the irritating words: "Take this!" So it was a mighty weapon David employed in that famous combat. A Jewish rabbi says that the probability is that Goliath was in such contempt for David that in a paroxysm of laughter he threw his head back and his helmet fell off, and David saw the uncovered forehead, and his opportunity had come, and taking this sling and swinging it around his head two or three times, and aiming it at that uncovered forehead, crashed it in like an eggshell. The battle over, behold the tableau: King Saul sitting, little David standing, his fingers clutched into the hair of decapitated Goliath. As Saul sees David standing there holding in his hand the ghastly, reeking, staring trophy, evidence of the complete victory over God's enemies, the king wonders what parentage was honored by such heroism, and in my text he asks David his pedigree, "Whose son art thou, thou young man?" The king saw what you and I see, that this question of heredity is a mighty question. The longer I live the more I believe in blood—good blood, bad blood, proud blood, humble blood, honest blood, thieving blood, heroic blood, cowardly blood. The tendency may skip a generation or two, but it is sure to come out, as in a little child you sometimes see a similarity to a great-grandfather whose picture hangs on the wall. That the physical and mental and moral qualities are inheritable is patent to any one who keeps his eyes open. The similarity is so striking sometimes as to be amusing. Great families, regal or literary, are apt to have the characteristics all down through the generations, and what is more perceptible in such families may be seen on a smaller scale in all families. A thousand years have no power to obliterate a difference. The House of Hapsburg has been in all the generations, and is called the Hapsburg lip. The House of Stuart always means in all generations cruelty and bigotry and sensuality: Witness Queen of Scots. Witness Charles I. and Charles II. Witness James I. and James II., and all the other scoundrels of that line. Scottish blood means persistence, English blood means nobility, Danish blood means religiosity, Danish blood means roaming disposition, Celtic blood means fervidity, Roman blood means conquest. The Jewish facility for accumulation you may trace clear back to Abraham, of whom the Bible says "he was rich in silver and gold and cattle," and to Isaac and Jacob, who had the same characteristics. Some families are characterized by longevity, and they have a tenacity of life positively Methuselah. Others are characterized by Goliathian stature, and you can see it for one generation, two generations, five generations, in all the generations. Vigorous theology runs down in the line of the Alexanders. Tragedy runs on in the family of the Kembles. Literature runs on in the line of the Trollopes. Philanthropy runs on in the line of the Wilberforces. Statesmanship runs on in the line of the Adamsses. You see these peculiarities in all generations. Henry and Catharine of Navarre religious, all their families religious. The celebrated family of the Casini, all mathematicians. The celebrated family of the Medici, grandfather, son and Catharine, all remarkable for keen intellect. The celebrated family of Gustavus Adolphus, all warriors. This law of heredity asserts itself without reference to social or political condition, for you sometimes find the ignoble in high place and the honorable in obscure place. A descendant of Edward I. a toll-gatherer. A descendant of Edward III. a doorkeeper. A descendant of the Duke of Northumberland, a trunk-maker. Some of the mightiest families of England are extinct, while some of those most honored in the peerage go back to an ancestry of hard knuckles and rough exterior. This law of heredity is entirely independent of social or political conditions. Then you find avarice and jealousy and sensuality and fraud having full swing in some families. The violent temper of Frederick William is the inheritance of Frederick the Great. It is not a theory founded by worldly philosophy, but by divine authority. Do you not remember how the Bible speaks of a chosen generation, of the generation of the righteous, of the generation of vipers, of an untoward generation, of a stubborn generation, of the iniquity of the fathers visited upon the children unto the third and fourth generation? So that the text comes to-day with the force of a projectile hurled from mightiest catapult, "Whose son art thou, thou young man?" "Well," says some one "that theory discharges me from all responsibility. Born of sanctified parents, we are bound to be good, and we cannot help ourselves. Born of unrighteous parentage, we are bound to be evil, and we cannot help ourselves." Two inaccuracies. As much as if you should say, "The centrifugal force in nature has a tendency to bring everything to the centre, and therefore all come to the centre. The centrifugal force in nature has a tendency to throw everything to the periphery, and therefore everything will go out to the periphery." You know yourself as I know that you can make the centripetal force overcome the centrifugal, and you can make the centrifugal overcome the centripetal. As when there is a mighty tide of good in a family that may be overcome by determination to evil, as in the case of Aaron Burr, the libertine, who had for father President Burr, the consecrated; as in the case of Pierrepont Edwards, the scourge of New York society eighty years ago, who had a Christian ancestry, while, on the other hand, some of the best men and women of this day are those who have come of an ancestry of which it would not be courteous to speak in their presence. The practical and useful object of this sermon is to show you that if you have come of a Christian ancestry, then you are solemnly bound to preserve and develop the glorious inheritance; or, if you have come of a depraved ancestry, then it is your duty to brace yourself against the evil tendency by all prayer and Christian determination, and you are to find out the family frailties, and in arming the castle put the strongest guard at the weakest gate. With these smooth stones from the brook, I hope to strike you, not where David struck Goliath, in the head; but where Nathan struck David, in the heart. "Whose son art thou, thou young man?"

There is something in all winter holidays to bring up the old folks. I think many of our thoughts at such times are set to the tune of "Auld Lang Syne." The old folks were so busy at such times in making us happy, and perhaps on less resource made their sons and daughters happier than you on larger resources are able to make your sons and daughters. The snow lay two feet above their graves, but they shook off the white blankets and mingled in the holiday festivities—the same wrinkles, the same stoop of shoulder under the weight of age, the same old style of dress or coat, the same smile, the same tones of voice. I hope you remember them before they went away. If not, I hope there are those who have recited to you what they were, and that there may be in your house some article of dress or furniture with which you associate their memories. I want to arouse the most sacred memories of your heart while I make the impassioned interrogatory in regard to your pedigree: "Whose son art thou, thou young man?"

First, I accost all those who are descended of a Christian ancestry. I do not ask if your parents were perfect. There are no perfect people now, and I do not suppose there were any perfect people then. Perhaps there was sometimes too much blood in their eye when they chastised you. But from what I know of you, you got no more than you deserved, and perhaps a little more chastisement would have been salutary. But you are willing to acknowledge, I think, that they wanted to do right. From what you overheard in conversations, and from what you saw at the family altar and at neighborhood obsequies, you know that they had invited God into their heart and their life. There was something that sustained those old people supernaturally. You have no doubt about their destiny. You expect if you ever get to heaven to meet them as you expect to meet the Lord Jesus Christ. That early association has been a charm for you. There was a time when you got right up from a house of iniquity and walked out into the fresh air because you thought your mother was looking at you. You have never been very happy in sin because of a sweet old face that would present itself. Tremulous voices from the past accosted you until they were seemingly audible, and you looked around to see who spoke. There was an estate not mentioned in the last will and testament, a vast estate of prayer and holy example and Christian entreaty and glorious memory. The survivors of the family gathered to hear the will read, and this was to be kept and that was to be sold, and it was "share and share alike." But there was an unwritten will that read something like this: "In the name of God, amen. I being of sound mind, bequeath to my children all my prayers for their salvation; I bequeath to them all the results of a lifetime's toil; I bequeath to them the Christian religion, which has been so much comfort to me, and I hope may be solace for them; I bequeath to them a hope of union when the partings of life are eternal riches. I bequeath to them the wish that they may avoid my error and copy anything that may have been worthy. In the name of God who made me, and the Christ who redeemed me, at the Holy Ghost who sanctifies me, I make my last will and testament. Witness thy hosts of heaven. Witness time and eternity. Signed, sealed and delivered in this our dying hour. Father and Mother." You did not get that will read at the Surrogate's office, but I take it out to-day and I read it to you. I take it out of the alcoves of your heart. I shake the dust off it. I ask if you will accept of inheritance, or will you break the will?

Oh, ye of Christian ancestry! you have a responsibility vast beyond all measurement. God will not let you off just being as good as ordinary people. You had such extraordinary advantages. Ought not a flower planted in a hot-house to be more thrifty than a flower planted in the storm? Ought not a factory turned by the Housatonic to do more than a factory turned by a thin and low mountain stream? Ought not you, who have had such great early opportunity to be better than those who had a cradle unblessed? Your father sets his son up in business. He keeps an account of all the expenditures. So much for store fixtures, so much for rent, so much for this, so much for that, and all the items aggregated, and the father expects the son to give an account. Your Heavenly Father charges against you all the advantage of a pious ancestry—so many prayers, so much Christian example, so many kind entreaties—all the gracious influences, one tremendous aggregate, and he asks you for an account of it. Ought not you to be better than those who had no such advantage? After have been a founding picked up in the city commons than with such magnificent inheritance of consecration to God, out indifferently.

Now, my brother, ought you not to leave it as a matter of fairness with you ought you not to be better than those who had no early Christian influence? Standing as you do between the generation that is past and the generation that is to come, are you going to pass the blessing or are you going to have your life the guide which that tide of blessing shall drop of sight forever? You are the trustee of piety in that ancestral line, and are you going to augment or squander that solid trust fund? Are you going to disincline your sons and daughters of the heirloom which your parents left you? Ah! it cannot be possible—that cannot be possible that you are going to take such a position as that. You are very careful about the life insurances, and careful about the deeds, and careful about the mortgage, and careful about the title of your property, because when you step off the stage you want your children to get it all. You making no provision that they should get grandfather or grandmother's religion. Oh, what a last will and testament are making, my brother! "In the name of God, amen. I, being of sound mind, make this my last will and testament. bequeath to my children all the money ever made and all the houses I own; I disinherit them, I rob them of the ancestral grace and the Christian influence I inherited. I have squandered that on my own worldliness. Share and share alike must they in the misfortune and the everlasting outrage."

Oh, ye of highly-favored ancestry, wake up this morning to a sense of your opportunity and responsibility. I think there must be an old cradle, or a fragment of cradle somewhere that could tell a story of midnight supplication in your behalf. Where is the old rocking-chair in which you were sung to sleep with the lullaby nursery rhyme? Where is the old clock that ticked away the moments of the sickness on that awful night when the we: but three of you awake—you and Go and mother? Is there not an old sta:n some closef? We beg you to turn over a new leaf this very day.

E: I turn for a moment to those who hadvil parentage, and I want to tell you that the highest thrones in heaven and the mightiest triumphs and the brightest crowns will be for those who had evil pantage, but who by the grace of God coniered—conquered. As good, as useful, as splendid a gentleman as I ever kne had for a father a man who died blaheming God until the neighbors had o put their fingers in their ears to sh out the horror. One of the most con-tracted and useful Christian minis-ter of to-day was the son of a drunken hor-jockey. Tide of evil tremendous in en families. It is like Niagara Rapids, sacret men have clung to a rock and been mesed. Sometimes one form of evil, sometimes another form of evil. But it ma be resisted, it has been resisted. If the family frailty be avarice, cultivate un-ghness and charity, and teach your chilren never to eat an apple without of-fering somebody else half of it. Is the family frailty combativeness, keep out of the company of quick-tempered people, and yet answer an impertinent question un-til you have counted a hundred both and, and after you have written an an-er, after, keep it a week before you send it, then burn it up. Is the family frailty timidity and cowardice, cultivate me; read the biography of brave me like Joshua or Paul and see if you can-ot get a little iron in your blood. Find out what the family frailty is, and set it, mind, and soul in battle array. Con- you will. I think the genealogical was put in the first chapter of the Testament not only to show our Lo's pedigree, but to show that a man rise up in an ancestral line and beat successfully all the influences of bad elity. See in that genealogical table that Eph and Mary and the most illustrious Beg that ever touched our world, or ever ouch it, had in their ancestral line alalous Rehoboam and Rahab and amar and Bathsheba. If this world is to be Edenized—and it will be—all the uted families of the earth are to be re-gerated and there will some one arise in our family line and open a new genealo-ical table. There will be some Joseph to rise in the line and reverse the evil influ-ence of Rehoboam, and there will be some M. to arise in the line and reverse the influence of Bathsheba. Perhaps the st of hope may point down to your mager. Perhaps you are to be the hero or the heroine that is to put down the bres and stop that long line of genealo-ical tendencies and switch it off on an-otr track from that on which it has been running for a century. You do that and will promise you as fine a palace as the architects of heaven can build, the way inscribed with the words: "More on conqueror." But whatever your fidelity, let me say you may be sons and daughters of the Lord God Almighty. Es-tranged children from the homestead, ue back through the open gate of adop-tion. There is royal blood in our veins, the are crowns on our escutcheon, our Father is King, our Brother is King, we may be kings and queens unto God forever. One and sit down on the ivory bench of tipalace. Come and wash in the foun-tains that fall into the basins of crystal and alabaster. Come and look out of the tolstered window upon gardens of azalea and amaranth. Hear the full burst of the or-chestra while you banquet with potentates and victors. Oh! when the text sweeps bkward, let it not stop at the cradle that rised your infancy, but at the cradle that rised the first world, and when the text steps forward, let it not stop at your gve, but at the throne on which you may reign, forever and ever. "Whose shalt thou, thou young man?" Son of God! Heir of immortality! Take your inheritance!

ing the Episcopal, Methodist Episcopal, Baptist, Presbyterian, and Disciples of Christ.

To those chaplains on the active list, the moral and religious work of our churches in the Navy is entrusted, and each is required to do the work of his church without a shadow of sectarianism. Christian unity is aimed at and largely realized in the Navy, and to the building up of character the chaplains are to work with might and main. They are appointed and commissioned like any other naval officer, by the President, by and with the consent of the Senate. As in the case of other staff officers, they hold relative rank with the line, their rank terminating with that of Captain, so that theirs is the privilege of the ship. Their uniform is not military, neither is it unimilitary, since it consists of the ordinary clerical dress, which is especially becoming on board ship.

Some of the chaplains are much interested in establishing reading rooms for the seamen, not only in our home ports, but in the leading ports of our several squad-ron stations, and a great deal of good has already resulted. One of the illustrations in this issue shows a quiet little group of seamen on a Sunday afternoon, engrossed with their religious books. By encourag-ing the free use of good literature, the chaplains have been able to greatly ad-vance the moral rating of the men as a whole. Thus the condition of our sailors is improving year by year.

The new ships

UNITED STATES WARSHIP "NEWARK"

they man have been an intellectual awak-ing to them. They are no longer mere "Jack-tars," and cannot be satisfied with the perfunctory attendance at "church," but enter into the exercises with heart and spirit.

All the men aboard ship are keenly ap-preciative of what the chaplains do for them. By popular lectures, and by earnest, practical, intelligent sermons and talks, the chaplains can reach them and have a great influence over them. On the big warships, many earnest Christians are to be found, both among officers and crews, and when the ship is not provided with a chaplain, there are usually men aboard who will unhesitatingly conduct the simple Sunday service, or the brief but earnest prayer-meetings. The Young Men's Christian Association has many members among the crews of the floating Navy, and the Society of Christian En-deavor is also well represented, both among the officers' staff and the marines.

When the men-of-war are at anchor near a seaport, or are in port, the friends and relatives of officers are cordially in-vited to attend the Sunday service.

Prayers are offered on deck every day at quarter after five o'clock in the afternoon, and this affords an opportunity to those who are so disposed to come together for a short time to unite their petitions. This is the custom on the flagships and first-raters, and many of the men on the other cruisers follow the same order.

Thus banded together as they are, each crew like a community by itself, on the great warships, these men attest their faith in the Heavenly Father, and in the Captain of Salvation, his Son, Jesus Christ. Whether resting at anchor in some home port or in foreign waters, or plunged in the heat of battle, many of these "heroes of the deep" place full de-pendence on God, and are living the lives of consistent Christians.

Little Guests at Mont Lawn.

A Haven of Rest and Recuperation for the Tenement Waifs—Happiness at the Home.

O those who dwell in clean, cool, well-venti-lated houses with every surrounding conducive to health and happiness, the actualities of tene-ment life in the slums of a great city are difficult of appreciation. It is not easy to un-derstand why so many human beings should be cooped up in close, unhealthy quarters at such cost of life and comfort. This summer, the Health Board of New York has taken up the question of tenement life vigorously, and many of the old filthy rookeries where men, women, and chil-dren have been hived, are now doomed to demolition. In a single day, lately, 42 rear tenements were condemned as unfit for hu-man habitation. They were found to be dark abodes of filth and squalor, such as are the unfailing breeding-places of disease and pestilence in the heat of summer. In some of these places the death rate has been abnormally high for weeks past, the little children being the heaviest sufferers. The normal death-rate of the city is twenty-two per thousand, but in such hov-els it reached seventy-five per thousand. Every day the white-plumed hearse with the little white coffins, told the sad story of poor children cut off ere yet their young lives had fairly begun. In one double tenement 472 persons were herded together in quarters wretched beyond description. Many of the rooms were never visited by the rays of the sun, and the general con-dition was such as to invite disease. It is understood that the Health Board has over one hundred tenements of the same class under consideration, and that they will shortly be condemned.

It has been the effort of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD'S Fresh Air Fund to seek out the children of the very poor from just such homes of misery as we have described, and to give them the benefit of a ten days' outing among the fresh green fields and the flowery woodlands of Mont-Lawn, where they might find a brief respite from the hard and pinching life of poverty. One day lately, Dr. Talmage visited the Home and received a cheery welcome from our children. He spent a pleasant afternoon inspecting the Home and its beautiful sur-roundings and speaking kind words to its delighted little guests, many of whom stood by barefooted to listen.

On Sunday morning, breakfast comes a little later at Mont-Lawn, and while Ma-tron Collins and her staff of co-workers are having family-prayers together in the reception-room, the children have an air-ing on the lawn. Then they march into chapel and go over the Sunday School les-son. Beside the usual good dinner, there are always some extras for Sunday, and the children sing with increased fervor the grace that always comes before each meal:

God is great and God is good,
And we thank him for this food;
By his hand must all be fed,
Give us all our daily bread.

The care-taker is often rewarded for a hard day's work by some thoughtful child coming up and putting her arms about her, saying, "Teacher, haven't we had a good time to-day?" They always greatly en-joy their walks to the woods, gathering birch and sassafras, ferns, and flowers.

Some of the children try to get their ten days extended, and almost envy those whom the doctor needs to keep for treat-ment a little over their time. One boy an-xious to stay longer tried to get someone to go home in his place, but did not succeed.

Contributions to our Fresh Air work are invited. This season, more than ever, the way is open to help these poor little children to an outing. For an outlay of $3 any reader of this journal can make some poor tenement child happy. The Wash-ington Square M. E. Church has generously contributed $150 in aid of the work among the poor children of the tenements: During the week the following contribu-tions have been received:

David's Victories.

Sunday School Lesson for Aug. 9. II. Sam. 10: 8-19. Golden Text, Psalm 27: 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

DAVID was a man of war; he "smote the Philistines and subdued them," and then went on to smite Moab, with the result that the Moabites "became David's servants, and brought gifts." He then proceeded to smite Hadadezer, the son of Rehob, king of Zobah, and when the Syrians of Damascus came to succor Hadadezer, David "slew of the Syrians two and twenty thousand men;" he also "put garrisons in Syria of Damascus, and the Syrians became servants to David, and brought gifts" (II. Sam. 8: 1-6). Success and victory attended him, he was in the height of prosperity: "The Lord preserved David whithersoever he went" (ver. 6); he consecrated the spoil which he took to the Lord, and yet Something was Lacking.

Throughout the life of David there had been, up to this time, one marked characteristic. He was a man who waited upon the Lord. In the time of his need he could say, "The Lord is my Shepherd, I shall not want," because he had inquired of the Lord; and he could testify, "Blessed be the Lord, because he hath heard my voice and my supplication. The Lord is my Strength and my Shield; my heart trusteth in him, and I am helped; therefore my heart greatly rejoiceth, and with my song will I praise him" (Ps. 28: 6, 7). In all the history of David's later wars, we miss this inquiry of the Lord which was so habitual with him in the time of his rejection, while Saul was still living, and also in the beginning of his reign (II. Sam. 5: 10-25).

It is no healthy sign when a believer becomes more independent of his God. David's consecration was just as great; he dedicated to the Lord the "vessels of silver, and vessels of gold, and vessels of brass . . . with the silver and gold that he had dedicated of all nations which he had subdued" (II. Sam. 19: 10, 11). But alas! "David gat him a name;" he ceased to be a nobody; he filled more room in his own thoughts and in the thoughts of others than had been the case earlier in his life, and his victories and his greatness prepared the way for his terrible fall.

Declension in Communion.

It is true that God continued to preserve him whithersoever he went, and it is true that on his part he "executed judgment and justice to all his people; but there was an evident declension in the habit of communion with God. "I have something against thee, because thou hast left thy first love." Nothing can make up for this; there may be the greatest zeal and the greatest advance in even the intellectual knowledge of the Bible, while communion with God flags. "Who am I, and what is my house that thou had brought me hitherto?" was a safe position for David, but it was not a safe position for him when he began to be in danger.

Edom became subject to him, and so was fulfilled, and it seemed as though in the future he would be able to do more for him. But a check, quite unsuspected to David, came to him through the misunderstanding of Hanun, the son of Nahash, king of Ammon, when David had said, "I will shew kindness unto Hanun, the son of Nahash, as his father shewed kindness unto me." David sent his messengers to comfort Hanun, but, persuaded by some advisers, Hanun grossly insulted David's messengers and sent them back. David was indignant; he looked at the matter as between Hanun and him, and he did not inquire of the Lord why he had permitted this misunderstanding to take place. Had he done so, he might have received a warning from God which this reverse was meant to bring him; he might have drawn nearer to God, and his disgraceful sin which soon followed might have been avoided. Once David had said, "I have set the Lord always before me; because he is at my right hand, I shall not be moved." But now David was moved. The children of Ammon, seeing that David's indignation was stirred, and that they had roused the lion in his den, sought help from the Syrians, and hired them to come and help them. David, strong in his inviolable victory, not in his God, sent Joab, his commander-in-chief, to the field. Hitherto David had gone to battle in person, but now he was relaxing in his ardor in the field, as he was relaxing in his communion with God. Joab saw that it was to be no easy victory, so "he chose of all the choice men of Israel, and put them in array against the Syrians," and instructed Abishai to marshal his men against the Ammonites, saying, "If the Syrians be too strong for me, then thou shalt help me; but if the children of Ammon be too strong for thee, then I will come and help thee. Be of good courage, and let us play the men for our people, and for the cities of our God; and the Lord do that which seemeth him good." It was like Joab. "Let us play the men," was the first thought. "Let God do what seemeth him good," was the last. But Joab was more than a match for the Syrians; he had some faith in God, they had none at all. The Syrians fled from before him; and the Ammonites, seeing this, took fright and they fled also.

But the Syrians did not so easily accept of their defeat; when they saw that they were smitten before Israel, they were gathered together; national pride would not suffer that a comparatively little country like Israel, the inhabitants of which had been for years such an obscure, insignificant people, should subject them to tribute, they must rally all their forces to avoid such a disastrous contingency. They issued a conscription even to the Syrians living beyond the Euphrates, that they might swell their ranks, and come up in power to overcome Israel. And now David was aroused, and gathered all Israel together and went in person to the field. And victory attended him as usual; the very kings which were tributary to Hadadezer turned round to make peace with Israel and served them. And the Syrians were subdued, and without risking any further loss, abandoned the Ammonites and returned, leaving David master of the field.

But again David had not enquired of the Lord, and again no mention is made here of the Lord his God. A great and terrible preparation was being made in the heart of this man of God for the sin which followed. Sin does not overcome a real man of God suddenly. Satan lays his plans well beforehand. If he can intoxicate a child of God with his own success, he has already begun to turn his eyes away from God. If he can make him presume upon his acquaintance with God to relax in the habit of consulting him about his way, he has already begun to turn his back on God. It is the most important approach to the citadel of that man's being, and he soon turns the key against God, and leaves the door open to temptation.

A man who could undertake war after war without inquiring of the Lord, could not be a true child of God. He was not inquiring of the Lord whether he was serving him with his eyes in this thing or not. It is the lack of habitual communion, communion in every detail, which makes the fall of a child of God possible. The lack of communion had come slowly and imperceptibly into David's life, but the fall was like a sudden, terrible fall over a precipice. And then the wicked devices by which David sought to cover up and to conceal his deed of darkness, show to what length a man of God may go when he has fallen away from real and constant communion with his God. A moment's independence of God is dangerous, our safety is to live in the fear of the Lord "all the day long." Not one of David's victories over the Philistines, the Syrians, the Moabites, the Ammonites or the Edomites was so great a victory as was the victory over himself.

ANCIENT WARRIOR.

ever, were apprehensive of a time when the young nation might become sufficiently rich and powerful to be a dangerous neighbor. It was regarded with suspicion, and not without reason. Inter-marriages were forbidden, and alliances were not sought. Holding aloof from all the nations, the young Hebrew nation was believed to be unfriendly, and only waiting the time when it should be strong enough to subdue its neighbors. With this feeling prevalent, it is not surprising that the courteous embassy to the Ammonites which David sent to express sympathy on the death of their king, should have been regarded with suspicion. The young king insulted David's messengers, knowing perfectly well that the insult would be avenged. He took measures to meet the coming storm. It was not difficult to get allies. The tribes were ready to unite against the common danger. There was soon a formidable coalition in the field, and without waiting for David's expected attack, siege was laid to Medeba, one of the chief cities belonging to Reuben, near the northern end of the Dead Sea. Knowing that Medeba could not be easily captured, and feeling sure that the coalition was the work of the Ammonite king, David sent a strong force against his capital. It was a bold step to take, and it involved a peril which threatened the destruction of his army. The Syrians who were besieging Medeba suddenly raised the siege, and by a rapid march came on the rear of the Hebrews. The situation was critical in the extreme. David was not there. In one of the earlier battles he had come near being killed, and the people insisted that he should not expose himself again, lest "the light of Israel should be quenched." Joab, therefore, was in command, and the tone of his remarks shows that he knew he was in a desperate strait. "The Lord do that which seemeth him good," was the expression of a man who realized that he was in great danger. He was in an enemy's country, with a powerful foe in front and another advancing on his rear. Dividing his army, and placing one part under the command of his brother Abishai, they gave battle to both forces simultaneously, and won a complete victory. Joab, however, was unable to capture the Ammonite capital, and as the coalition forces were preparing for a new and more formidable attack, he withdrew to Jerusalem. A new attack was the greatest danger at hand yet menaced the young king. The king of Syria raised contingents of all his tributaries and allies, and prepared for an invasion of Palestine. David did not remain at home in such a crisis. Summoning all his available forces, he crossed the Jordan and went out to meet his formidable antagonist before he entered the territory. The battlefield could now be identified, but it appears to have been on the northeast not far from Euphrates. David won so decisive a victory that the coalition disbanded. Syrians left the Ammonites to their aid and only escaped themselves by a payment of tribute. They also suffered a loss of prestige. Their tributaries finding that the Syrians were not invincible, transferred their allegiance to the conqueror, and David extended the frontiers of his kingdom.

The children of Ammon came out. David believed that God had given him the kingdom, but he had to fight to keep it. When a boy or girl becomes a Christian there is often a hard battle to do. God will not keep away all enemies. He expects us to make a struggle against our own inclinations and against temptation. "How is it you can manage your relations so well?" asked one girl of another as they came out of school. "I pray God to help me," was the reply. "I will pray, too," said the first. And did, but meeting her companion the next day she said it had done no good; she failed worse than ever. "Did you study the lesson?" her friend asked. "No," she said, "I did not think that necessary if I prayed. I supposed it would help me to say it." God does help people by doing for them what they should do for themselves, but when a son who is doing his utmost asks for help it is given.

Against him before and behind. People who want to live right, are often placed in a position as difficult as this of Joab. When they have been accustomed to use wicked words and telling untruths, taking what does not belong to them, it is very hard to give up those habits. When a provocation comes, or an opportunity occurs, the old habit impels them to do what they have been accustomed to do, they have thus an enemy without, within, as Joab had a foe before and behind. A boy who lived in an English town where his associates were wicked, who thought nothing of stealing from the fruit stands or the stores, went to a mission school where he was taught that such things were wicked. After a time resolved to quit stealing and other evil ways, and he asked God to help him. Some time afterwards, his teacher came to the school without a book that she needed and she asked the boy if he would go home and fetch it. He was glad to do so, but the teacher standing at the window of the school saw the boy turn south the end of the block, when his direction course lay north. When he returned, she asked him why he took that longer way. The boy blushed, and did not like to answer. At last, being pressed, he said he avoided that street because there was a barrel of apples outside a grocery store there. Old habit was so strong in him yet that he did not want to fight inclination and opportunity at the same time.

If the children of Ammon be too strong for thee then I will come and help thee. Joab's promise to his younger brother would keep him from losing heart. I would do his utmost, knowing that if he did not succeed his brother would come to his succor at the last extremity and not him be routed. Sometimes God acts that way toward his children. When it seems as if they could not struggle any longer and as if they must give way and fall into sin God interposes and saves them. In 1346, when Edward III. of England invaded France, a fierce battle was fought at Crecy. The king's son, the Black Prince, had command of one of the divisions of the army. It was engaged early in the day and word was sent to him that it was in urgent need of help. The king heard but did not send any of the reserves as his son seemed to be holding his own. A second messenger afterwards a third came to him, but he sent no help, wishing the young prince to have all the glory of the victory, but there had ever been serious danger of defeat the king would have been quickly on the scene with the flower of his army.

A Mission to the Rich.

THE "Inasmuch Ten" of the King's Daughters in Belmont Centre had devoted themselves all the year to helping the poor. There were not many very poor people in their neighborhood, but they had found gifts of compassion in the nearest large city, and their boxes of clothing in winter and flowers in summer had gone impartially and constantly to asylums and hospitals, so that a host of thankful hearts needed their loving work.

On her way to the meeting of the Ten, held at a member's house, every Friday evening at ten o'clock, the President stopped to leave a message from her mother, the home of a lovely old lady, said to be the richest woman in Belmont county. Lovely qualities belong to rich as well as to poor people, we all know, and Mrs. Squires was so amiable, so gentle, so tactful, that far and wide she was famed for her kindness of disposition and her grace of manner. Katharine Hillerton rushed into a little reception-room by maid and asked to wait a moment. Presently Mrs. Squires entered and greeted the young visitor very cordially, but Katharine's quick eyes noted that she grew a little, and put out a hand to steady herself, by a chair or a table, as she came forward.

"Why, dear Mrs. Squires," she asked with much concern, "what has happened? What is the matter? Are you ill?"

"No, dear child, I am not ill. I never was better in my life. But, Kathie, I am going blind. It has been coming on slowly a long time, first a dimness, and a feeling as if cobwebs were over my eyes, and I had to brush them away; then the veil grew thicker, and now, for the past week, the darkness is settling down. I am going to be deprived of much that I have loved and delighted in, Katharine, especially reading, which has been my passion, and my solace in sorrowful hours. But must be borne, and I am praying for patience. God will help me to be brave and keep me from inflicting my trouble on my friends."

"But can nothing be done?" urged Katharine, who had all the hot and eager impulsiveness of youth, and had never yet encountered an obstacle which refused to yield to her resolute onslaught.

"After awhile," said her friend, "there came an operation, and the cataract can be removed; they tell me it is very simple, like a breath, just a click of the surgeon's little scissors, and the opaque covering will drop off; but one must wait for the right moment before this can be done. One of my friends had to wait five years in the dark, Katharine. One must just have courage and patience, dear child."

Katharine went soberly on to her appointed place of meeting. The Inasmuch Ten gathered in force, and the ten beautiful maidens, true Daughters of the King, were all present. After the usual opening exercises, reports and proceedings were over, when in due order it came to "new business," the President asked somebody to take the chair, as she had a proposition to make to the Ten.

A few sentences she related the circumstances in which their old friend Mrs. Squires found herself, and then proposed that the Ten should add to their labors of love, that of entertaining and assisting to dear gentlewoman.

"She has means, and could pay a companion," said Maud Allaire.

"That is true," remarked Jean Marks. "It is quite possible that her old services would not get on so well with a young lady whom they did not know, and Mrs. Squires has no nieces or youthful cousins to call on. She has been by herself so long, with only her brother and her son coming home at night, that a change would not please her. I would like to hear a little more fully what Katharine has in her mind."

"Simply this," said Katharine. "We girls might arrange to go at a certain hour, agreeable to Mrs. Squires, every day and read to her. We could take turns, two each day, and in that way she could get through a large book, or a course of books this season. We could play and sing to her in the evenings, and, without seeming to intrude our efforts, I think we can brighten Mrs. Squires' gloom. Suppose we take this as part of our work?"

The suggestion met with favor, and Mrs. Squires found many of her hitherto slowly-moving hours filled with cheerful com-

The secret of her wretchedness was that she was so out of harmony with the love and peace of God, that she was in opposition to the best part of her own nature. As she opened the little book, a word riveted her attention. She read a page, then another, and another. By the time she had reached the end, she took down her Bible from the book-shelf, and was soon lost in chapters which had for her the charm of a remembered melody, blending their music with the flute-like tones of a mother's voice, a voice now mingling with the songs of the ransomed beside the crystal sea. If we are on the lookout for them we can always find sweet opportunities for being helpful. Wealth and poverty are accidental conditions. Under the sheen of velvet and the frost of lace, a heart needing consolation may beat as under rags and threadbare garments. To be always at our King's orders, always ready and willing to do the next thing, this is to earn the plaudit bye-and-bye, of "Well done, good and faithful servant. Thou hast been faithful over a few things. Enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

Oppressed Christians of Crete.

Turkish Persecution Causing a Reign of Terror on the Lovely Island.

HARDLY had the echoes of the frightful atrocities perpetrated by the Turks and Kurds in Armenia died away, when the island of Crete became the ply of arms. The utmost disorder prevails." This was confirmed by the foreign Consuls in Crete, who also announced to their governments that burning and pillaging by Turks were events of almost daily occurrence. As far as could be learned, reliably, Georgi Berovitch Pasha, the lately appointed Christian Governor of Crete, was strongly advocating the rights of his people to certain reforms which would secure good government and domestic peace, but owing to the open encouragement given by Turkey to the fanatical attacks on the Christians, he was practically powerless. Turks assembled in the public squares with the avowed purpose of attacking the Christians. Turkish warships lying off shore shelled and destroyed peaceful villages without a shadow of justification, and without any opposition or resistance. At some places, however, where premeditated attacks were made by Turkish land forces, they were repulsed by the patriotic Cretans with considerable loss. At others, scores of inoffensive Cretans were cruelly butchered in cold blood by the troops. At Kostani a company of Turkish regulars cut down seven men and two women who were at work in a harvest field. Villages were pillaged, houses burned, cattle and goods stolen, stores plundered, and women and girls assaulted, as in the towns and hamlets of Armenia. Protests by the foreign consuls were worse than useless. At Apokorona, where an armistice had been agreed to, the Turks deliberately ignored it, and having been reinforced, made an assault upon the place. The Vail, or Governor, tried to stop the fighting, but he was thrust aside. Abdullah Pacha, the military commander, made preparations to arm the Mussulman populace, in order that they might join in the slaughter. A large number of men, women, and children were massacred.

It soon became evident that the Porte, pursuing the same fiendish course it had followed in Asia Minor, had resolved to either exterminate the Cretan Christians or to so completely subjugate them as to crush out all national spirit and supplant the religion of the Cross by that of the Crescent in every town and village throughout the island. The European powers made a formal protest to Turkey, insisting that the Ottoman troops on the island should act on the defensive, as the Porte had previously promised. This remonstrance fell on unheeding ears, Greece alone has shown practical sympathy with Crete, and has rendered material assistance in permitting the shipment of arms and munitions from Greek ports for the use of the Cretan patriots.

In May last, when the Turks made the first hostile demonstration against the Cretans at Vamos, the present troubles may be said to have begun. At that time 1,300 Turkish troops were hemmed in there by an inferior Cretan force. Then followed, probably by way of reprisal, the massacres at Canea and elsewhere. Since that date nearly a score of villages have been burned and pillaged in the province of Kissamo and as many in Kithonen. In June two Christian churches were pillaged in Kithonia and one at Kythmeus. Pillaging also took place at Blamo, Suda and other places. The Sultan sent to Crete detachments of the troops who had done service in Armenia, particularly those who had served in the Zeitoun district. These fanatics, fresh from fields of slaughter, came to Crete and openly boasted of the crimes they had committed in Armenia. They even sold in the streets of Canea the rings, jewels and rugs of which they had despoiled the Armenian families of the better class, whom they had murdered or plundered. Such were the men whom Abdul Hamid sent to preserve the peace on the Christian island. At the beginning of the year there were 6,000 Turkish troops in Crete; there are now over 20,000.

Our illustration on this page presents a sad picture of suffering in a schoolhouse at Retimo, to which the Christian victims of a Turkish attack have fled for shelter from their fanatical Moslem persecutors. These people came from the outlying towns.

pany, and gay occupation. Music was one of her favorite pleasures, and these girls gave her their songs and marches, and were at her call whenever she wished them, so that she always looked back on this period of her life, with genuine gratitude for their thoughtful care of her, and their sweet, girlish kindness. Nor did their other work lose in the least, for Mrs. Squires opened both heart and purse in channels made known to her by the Inasmuch Ten. Many a poor widow and many an ailing child were benefited in ways which would not have been discovered but for the rich woman's bounty, and her interest, quickened by her young friends.

One thing leads to another, and the Inasmuch Ten found out that there are missions needed to brown-stone fronts as well as to back alleys. There was Ruth Barclay, who rode in her carriage daily, but always with a look of dull misery and blank indifference which went to one's heart. Nobody could question Miss Barclay, but Louise Sinclair one day called on her, and going out, left a bunch of violets and a tiny book on the table; the violets told their story in fragrance, and Miss Barclay, as she lifted them to put them in water, saw the book, and picked it up with a scornful smile which would have grieved Louise had she been there to see it.

There is always this to be said, that one never knows where she is to meet Jesus, and to be impressed by his Divine love and goodness.

scene of barbarities of a like terrible nature. In a recent issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, the cause of the persecution of the Cretans was fully explained and it was then shown that the Sultan's government, thirsting for more Christian victims, had seized upon the slight political agitation on that island as a pretext for pouring into Crete the armed myrmidons who have been guilty of the dreadful massacres of the defenceless Armenians. But Crete has apparently learned a lesson from the fate of the people of Armenia, for the Cretan leaders are making a bold stand in defence of their homes and their religion.

For many months the persecution of the Christians of Crete had been going on before Europe was apprised of the real situation. England sent an envoy to investigate, and his report was one that might well have aroused that country to instant action on behalf of the sufferers, but nothing was done to stay the barbarous hand of the Turk. Then Emperor William sent a representative on a similar mission, and this official—Dr. Dumiller—on reaching Athens on his return made this startling declaration:

"Civilized people can scarcely credit the outrages which the Turks have perpetrated on Christian women and children. Europe has but a faint idea of the horrors which have taken place. The Powers must absolutely intervene to prevent a renewal of such scenes. There is but one course to pursue, that is to turn the Turks out of Europe. The insurgents intend fighting, and they are receiving a plentiful sup-

A Heroine for Christ.

Mme. Coillard and Her Bravery in the Face of Danger in Equatorial Africa.

IN the long roll of consecrated men and women who have laid down their lives for the cause of Christ in tropical Africa, there is no more devoted or faithful name than that of Christina Mackintosh, better known as Mme. Coillard, the wife of the indomitable French Protestant missionary. A part of her life was spent with him in Africa, spreading the Gospel among the heathen tribes of the interior. Her friend, Miss Alice Bertrand of Paris, lovingly tells the story of Mme. Coillard's resolution to devote herself to the African work, and what blessed results attended her efforts.

Madame Coillard, she writes, lived one of those harmonious lives whose mature age is the realization of their youthful. She already loved missions when a little girl, in her quiet Scotch parsonage of Greenock. She had subscribed, out of own pocket-money, to a missionary paper for children. In 1855 she was in Paris with her sister. There she made the acquaintance of a young theological student, Francois Coillard. . . . He had already been for three years in Basutoland, when his betrothed joined him at the Cape of Good Hope. They were married there on November 23d, 1861. "Never," said Madame Coillard to her husband on her wedding-day—"never will you find me between you and your duty; wherever you have to go, be it to the end of the world, I shall follow you." The young couple settled at Leribe, a secluded spot of Basutoland, where French Protestants have a large mission.

They built a cottage, and had a garden with flowers. Madame Coillard hoped never to leave it, but the churches of Basutoland had decided to found a mission-field where native evangelists might find some scope for their activity, and for that purpose Monsieur Coillard was requested to explore the land of the Banays. After an unsuccessful expedition to the Banays, they visited the region of the Zambesi, where the language of the Basutos was still spoken, and settled there.

Madame Coillard's favorite work was teaching. A few days before her death she was sitting among the prattling wives of the king, cutting out dresses for them, and telling them, in her own sweet way, the parable of the prodigal son. But the education of those coarse women proved a most arduous task, and Madame Coillard far preferred the children's school—that captivating school, as she called it—which was founded as soon as they had definitely settled among the Barotses. They hoped it to be a means of drawing the natives to the Gospel through their children. The school-room was formed by the shadows of the trees, and, instead of using slates and copy-books, the children wrote upon the sand. Children came in large numbers. King Lewanika held instruction in high reverence, and he had little huts built for his sons near the mission station, so that they should lose no opportunity in learning. What seems more wonderful still, the girls themselves would join their brothers. Fond of her home as she was, Madame Coillard decided to sacrifice it in some measure, in order to admit the daughters of the king and the little slaves into her family. The little Barotses were soon learned enough to pass a public examination in reading, singing, and reciting. That school festival must have been no common spectacle, honored, as it was, by the presence of the black king himself, who alternately encouraged or blamed the candidates, following the reading with a her to travel for her health. "No," she replied; "life is too short and our work here too extensive. Let us remain faithfully at our post. The Master knows that I want my health, and should it be His wish, He might give it to me here without my going to find it elsewhere."

One day, when returning from a missionary journey with her husband and Mademoiselle Kiener, a devoted Swiss young lady whom she considered as her own daughter, fever laid her low. After a day of great mental agony she became calm and serene, "talking of invisible things as one who is already on the threshold of heaven." The day before her death she said to her husband, "Dying is not so difficult as I feared. It is not painful, and then the passage is so very short. Underneath are the everlasting arms." A few hours later, she went quietly to sleep in the peace of the Lord.

An Excursion up Vesuvius.

During the recent visit of the British fleet to Naples, an excursion on a large scale was arranged, to which nearly a hundred officers were invited. It was a novel sight to witness this unusual company ascending the volcanic mountain on mule-back. The illustration on this page shows them on the second stage of their journey, while ascending from the Observatory to the foot of the famous tunicular railway (indicated by a straight line on the right of the mountain), which leads up to a point almost overlooking the crater itself. It is a bold undertaking and, before the days of scientific railroading, would have been deemed utterly impracticable. Now, however, it is a common sight to see a volcano in active operation.

Scandinavians and the Gospel.

In no part of the Union is a more interesting missionary work going on at present than that which is being conducted by the American Sunday School Union among the Scandinavians in the Northwest. In a recent report, F. L. Trelstad, a missionary of the A. S. S. U., in North Dakota, writes: "During the past year I have organized among these people 12 new schools; reorganized 9 schools; visited 58 schools; made 802 visits to families and delivered 138 public addresses. I had a conference of Scandinavian Sunday School workers this year—the first of the kind ever held in the State. The old schools are doing good work. There is a large attendance in most of them, better instruction, and a greater interest in all Christian work. Last summer a large number of my schools had regular preaching. God has also wonderfully blessed the revival work this winter. Forty persons or more have accepted Christ. The last revival held was together with a Norwegian M. E. minister at Moe Union Sunday school, twenty-seven miles from Valley City.

car, designed by Mr. Eckholm, which steered by a sail and well provided with ropes, ballast, and weights, and also boats, for use in the event of open water being reached. The working of the apparatus is in the hands of Mr. Strindberg. Wilson will also be of the party, and there will be a crew of competent seamen. Traits of Dr. Andree and his scientific associates, Eckholm and Strindberg, are given on this page. The last named will have the steering apparatus, which is liable to be deranged by any gale of wind or he snow that the balloon may happen to counter aloft, or by obstructions which may be found among the rocks and fragments of ice that encumber the surface land or sea. The polar balloon, named Svea, which has been constructed with care and labor in Paris, is one of 1000 metres capacity, to be filled, on the spot, of Spitzbergen, with hydrogen gas produced by the portable manufacturing apparatus used for military service; it will and sustain a car with three passengers having with them provisions and stores for about four months, instruments for scientific observations, and a quantity of ballast, weighing in all 3000 kilograms, but Dr. Andree does not expect to remain in the air more than a few days at a time. He says that high winds and snow are rare in July and August of rare occurrence in the Arctic region, while thunder and lightning are there almost unknown; the sun at this season is always by night and above the horizon, so that there will be actual darkness, and the voyagers will have a constant and uninterrupted view of all that lies beneath and around them. Considering all this, we shall not be much surprised with some gain to geographical and meteorological science.

Street Merchants of the East.

Cake-venders of Cairo and Damascus—The Simple Diet of the Orientals.

IO one who has walked the streets and paused in the market-places of any Oriental city, the scene presented in the photograph will be readily recognized. Along the thoroughfares of Damascus, Cairo, Alexandria and other cities, one encounters a multitude of venders of articles of almost every description. Fruits, sweets, pretty trifles for the eye and relics of the "sacred past" are all ostentatiously pressed upon the attention of the stranger. In the great bazaars, a bedlam of hurrying voices assails his ears and he is driven to quick purchase or flight to save himself from the persistent attentions of the importunate vendors. There are many little stalls, each probably not more than half a dozen feet square, crowding the highway—which can hardly be called a street—and behind these sit the tradesmen making and selling their goods. Pottery, saddlery, gold and silver, cloth stuffs and silks, shoes and rings, cakes, and endless variety of other articles are ranged on every side to tempt the buyer.

Bread-making in the East is a primitive art, except in a few of the wealthier homes, where Western ideas and methods have been adopted. Cakes, such as those shown in the photograph, are almost universally made by the natives of Syria, Egypt and Palestine, and even of the Bedouins and Arabs. For home use the flour is sifted and kneaded, and set to rise in an earthen pan. After more kneading, the risen dough is cast upon a cloth-covered board or table, where it is divided and patted into thin sheets, apparently no thicker than linen. These are baked on a convex piece of heated iron or on smooth, heated stones, and require but a few minutes to cook thoroughly. The cakes when cool and ready for use have a top and bottom crust, with a space between and are sourish in taste, besides being tough. They are altogether lacking in the crispness which is held to be an essential characteristic of the Western house-wife's baking. Still they are wholesome and nourishing, and dipped into milk, pottage or stew, as is customary in the average household, they form a conspicuous part of every meal. Rice, olives, oil, onions, cabbage, potatoes, lentils, and an abundance of smaller vegetables, not omitted, constitute the main ingredients of the ordinary Oriental diet. Meat is a rarity, and in many homes is not even thought of. The whole cost of a family dinner, save among the rich, would hardly suffice to pay for a single meal for one person in the West, even though it should be of the plainest and cheapest description.

The Habit of Work.

A good habit of systematic work is a great factor of success. Having once formed such a habit we are left free to look beyond the mere details of the work and to see how best we may accomplish that which we have undertaken. This is the way we should learn to do our work, whatever it may be. The details of it should never trouble us, but they should become as a second nature. We should be so accustomed to beginning the day at the same time each morning, that when an exception occurs we should feel somewhat at a loss. We should be hardly conscious of taking up each separate task, but should go to it as a matter of course. There by their head-dress, the unmarried girls wearing either no head-dress or a simple handkerchief on their heads, while the married women and widows wear a stiff starched, picturesque-looking white cap. During the season Odde is in daily communication with Bergen; and little native steamers ply on the fjords, and one of the most interesting sights for travelers is to watch the scenes on board.

Taking Tea With a Queen.

A young English girl, who had the honor of dining at Windsor Castle, has given her impressions of that event to the world. She writes:

I discovered that it was not considered etiquette to speak loud or talk much, and the proper thing really was to keep one's attention fixed chiefly on the Queen in the hope that she would condescend to address one. I must admit that this was the very last thing that I hoped for; and as I thought it highly improbable that she would speak to me

Hymn for the Children.

WHAT can I do for Jesus' sake,
Who bore such grief and pain;
Can I a little child so weak
Revere his blessed name?

Yes I can thank him for his love
And praise him for his grace,
His home of light and peace above
He left to take my place.

His kingly robes he laid aside,
Became a child like me,
Upon the Cross he bled and died
Love wondrous, rich and free.

But, oh! the hills are steep to climb,
My feeble efforts fail,
Unless thou help I fall behind
Exposed to every gale.

Teach me thy precepts to obey
Thy Spirit, Lord, impart,
And keep me in the narrow way
Close to thy wounded heart.

My mind relieve from thoughts impure,
My heart make snow-white clean
That every little child may know
That with thee I have been.

Love in the Home.

IFANCY that the home is always much rarer than we think, writes W. D. Howells. If there are more comfort and more widespread ease and leisure among us, the conditions for the home are more favorable, for it is useless to deny that where there is great poverty, as where there is great luxury, the conditions for the home are bad. The home flourishes best in that middle environment where the family is held strongly together by a common feeling of its supreme value. But where the habitation is bare and squalid there can be no sense of home; and where the social and material circumstances are full of invitation outside of it, the home cannot seem the first good of life.

It is the family, however, that makes the home; it is often, if not usually, one temperament, the temperament of the mother, that makes it; and this will have more effect in great poverty than in great luxury. We have all seen some woman nature holding a wretched household together, and shedding its own inner loveliness upon everything in it; and we have all seen some such woman-nature clogged with superfluity, denied its function of giving and blessing, and thrown back upon itself, in circumstances where want could not be imagined. Love expresses itself in help, and where the help is hired there must be less sense of love than where the help is given. Probably, then, there are more who look back tenderly to the house of poverty than to the house of luxury; but one cannot deny that it is possible to look back to a palace home with fond regret. I never heard of such a case, but it is possible to suppose it.

With the middle class, I believe the home is more than with the highest or the lowest class. The house where there is neither want nor surfeit is peculiarly the ideal shelter of the home. Its inmates, especially the womankind, are dedicated but not sacrificed to the care of it; they are its votaries, not its victims, and their love of it makes it beautiful and precious to all who dwell in it.

Japan's Christian Wives.

During the recent China-Japanese war, the Christian wives of Christian Japanese soldiers made the light of their faith shine brightly. Appreciating their husbands' severe sacrifices, they kept their homes pure; and performed their duties toward their parents-in-law, as well as attended to the education of their children. So faithfully and wisely were these duties performed that their husbands, on their return, found their homes happy and in good condition. The difference, when compared with those of their heathen comrades, filled their hearts with joy and gratitude. Is this not good evidence of the power of Christian influence upon the very foundation of society—the home?

ARAB CAKE VENDERS ON THE STREETS OF DAMASCUS.

is necessarily in most of our lives more or less routine. The same things, have to be gone over day after day, and, so far as they themselves are concerned, it makes little difference in what order we do them so long as they are done.

Sunday in Norway.

A Sunday is an interesting day, writes Paul Lange in Travel, especially if it should happen to be the third Sunday, when church is held at Odde. The natives flock from twenty to thirty miles away, and as the chief communications are by water, dozens of most interesting boat-loads of families are brought here to land. Not many countries have national costumes left, but Norway is one of the exceptions; and here on Sunday the picturesque Hardanger costume can be observed and studied. The position of the women is denoted when there were mamma and the Ministers' wives to talk to I allowed my eyes to wander and to admire the beautiful gold plate and flowers, the magnificence of the whole display on the table, the fine tapestry with which the walls were adorned. Her Majesty did not address me at all, but confined her conversation to my seniors—if that can be called a conversation which is chiefly carried on by one person. In spite of my intense awe, I almost burst out laughing at the sight of mamma sitting up so mum and saying so little. But after all there was a marvellous sameness between this and other dinners, when the first impressions had worn off a little. The plate was gold instead of silver, the servants were in scarlet and gold liveries, and there was the Queen! But otherwise the chief distinction was that it was more than usually solemn, and I was very glad when the Queen rose and we all followed her in silence. After dinner we adjourned to the corridor, and not as I had half hoped, to the drawing rooms. However, the evening was shorter in consequence, for the Queen made no pretence of sitting down. She went round and spoke to each guest in turn. There was actually a moment when I realized that she was addressing me. I answered like an automaton. And so my dinner party ended, for it was practically over with the departure of the Queen, though the evening continued for some time in an unofficial way. We left the castle early on the following morning and did not see the Queen again.

Our Prayer-Meeting.

HERE we are in our week-night service. The meeting is open for remarks; but let us have no great speeches. There is nothing that takes the life out of a prayer-meeting sooner than rhetoric. I would as soon have a meeting buried in dry dust as to have it smothered in flowers. The best speech I ever knew a man to make in a prayer-meeting was by a young convert who got up, said nothing and broke down crying. We all cried with him. Rhetorical prayer-meeting talkers are apt to be cold and cheerless. Icebergs are brilliant to look at three miles off, but ships steer clear of them; and these men that float down cold, hard, and brilliant, are dangerous.

Is there any man here with a trouble? Let him talk it right out. Trouble handed around is like delicate glassware which, passing through a good many hands, drops and breaks all to pieces, and there is nothing much left of it. If you belong to a church where there are six hundred members, you ought to be obliged to carry only a six hundredth part of any one trouble. Every Christian, coming near you, ought to subtract his part of the annoyance.

Have you a joy? Out with it! Set your candle up on the mantelpiece. When in boyhood, in the country, I went to prayer-meeting, we went across the cornfield in groups, and father would take a lantern and go ahead, and we would all follow in the light of that one lantern, not stumbling or losing our way. Let your light so shine before men! Don't sit during prayer-meeting with your head down in your hands as though you had been asleep two weeks. The homeliest part of you is the top of your head. Let your face shine.

It is astonishing how dull religious audiences do look! In lecturing halls you see people with eyes wide open, nudging each other and nodding to the sentiments offered. In prayer-meetings the same people look dull. They cultivate the dull look. They have an idea that to be devotional they must look sleepy. A brother gets up to talk, and a father in Israel puts his head down on a cane, and a mother in Israel her head on the back of the seat in front of her, and another looks up to the ceiling and seems to be counting the cracks in it. Now when a man is trying to talk, look at him. There is inspiration in the human eye. Most of the time I have seen people with little to say, but in the upturned faces of the people I have seen twenty sermons, and the only bother was to know which I should preach. The venerable Dr. Tyng said after preaching an eloquent sermon: "It takes no brains to preach to such an audience as that! The very look of it is an inspiration, and you cannot help but talk!"

The reason there are so few good talkers in prayer-meeting is because there are so few good listeners. When a brother gets up and makes a slip of the tongue don't snicker, or, what is worse, look mortified. Let your countenance say, "Try that again! We have all been through the same process. We must all creep before we walk." It is a happy cross to carry. One-half of the people who talk in prayer-meetings go home discouraged, half sick, and cross about the remarks they have made. They feel disgusted. Seek them out, and tell them they did first-rate (that is, if you can do so without lying). The genuine Christian man never does half so poorly as he thinks he does.

The reporters do not get the best speeches. When a man, warm with religious hope, gets up to encourage others, though it be in broken sentences, and with a phraseology that no grammarian would attempt to parse, the speech is telegraphed to heaven before the man is done, and published before the throne, and not only the group in the prayer-meeting, but a million glorified spirits attend and approve. If we get to heaven we will not be stopped at the gate to see if we can parse, or whether we know the difference between the perfect and the pluperfect.

Before your prayer-meeting closes let us hear from the unsaved. There are men and women present who know Christ so well they could in five minutes put your case in his hands. The path between the house and the country well is worn, and the grass has no chance to grow there. Between these Christian hearts and the well of salvation the path is deeply worn.

Let us all be honest in our prayer-meeting duties. Sometimes the most inconsistent Christians make the most shining talks at class-meetings. One of the worst liars I ever knew was always talking in prayer-meetings about the imperfections of Christians. If your experience is at a discount don't pass it off as above par, or try to make us believe that a chromo is an oil painting.

I think the keeping of diaries sometimes gets people into the habit of religious inaccuracy. No man likes to put down in his diary just what he feels. I have no doubt that Payson and Baxter sometimes committed sins that could not very well be put into blank verse. If we keep a diary of experiences we ought to put down things just as they are. I tried that once, but soon tore up the book for fear somebody would get hold of it and read it.

God help us all to be honest and faithful in this night's work! Let us gather our chairs close up around the fire. Put more sticks on the blaze. Let us have a good hearty talk about the things that most concern us. Soon our company will break up, and our place will be vacant, and our last chance for helping each other will be gone forever. But God grant that the fire may still burn on the altar, and our children pile on the fagots, till all the world shall come and sit in the warm shining!

Anon the Author.

IN boyhood days we were impressed with the fertility of a certain author whose name so often appeared in the spelling-books and readers, styled Anon. He seemed to write more than Isaac Watts, or Shakespeare, or Blair. In the index, and scattered throughout all our books, was the name of Anon. He appeared in all styles of poetry, and prose, and dialogue. We wondered where he lived, what his age was, and how he looked. It was not until quite late in boyhood that we learned Anon was an abbreviation of anonymous, and that he was sometimes the best saint and at other times the most extraordinary villain.

After centuries of correspondence old Anonymous is as fertile of thought and brain and stratagem as ever, and will probably keep on writing till the last fire burns up his pen and cracks to pieces his ink-bottle. Anonymous letters sometimes have a mission of kindness and gratitude and good cheer. Genuine modesty may sometimes hide the name of an epistolary author or authoress. It may be a "God bless you" from some one who thinks herself hardly in a position to address you. It may be the discovery of a plot for your damage, in which the revelator does not care to take the responsibility of a witness. It may be any one of a thousand things that mean frankness, and delicacy, and honor, and Christian principle. We have received anonymous letters which we have put away among our most sacred archives.

But we suppose every one chiefly associates the idea of anonymous communications with everything cowardly and base. There are in all neighborhoods perfidious, sneaking, destardly, filthy, calumnious, vermin-infested wretches, spewed up from perdition, whose joy it is to write letters with fictitious signatures. Sometimes it takes the shape of a valentine—the fourteenth of February being a great outlet for this obscene spawn. If your nose be long, or your limbs slender, or your waist thick around, it will be pictorially presented. Sometimes it takes the form of a delicate threat that if you do not thus or so, there will be a funeral at your house, yourself the chief object of interest. Sometimes it will be denunciatory of your friends. Once, being called to preside at a meeting for the relief of the sewing-women of Philadelphia, and having been called in the opening speech to say something about oppressive contractors, we received some twenty anonymous letters, the purport of which was that it would be unsafe for us to go out of doors after dark. Three months after moving to Brooklyn we preached a sermon reviewing one of the sins of the city, and anonymous letters came, saying that we would not last six months in the city of churches.

Obituary.

WE have heard of the death of a veteran of world-wide fame. His beard and hair were very white and, we are sorry to say, white with sin; we mean bigotry. He took a bad cold standing in the door of the Evangelical Alliance. Since then he has been lingering on, sometimes better and sometimes worse until now he is dead. You may think you see him again but it will only be the ghost of his former self. The fact is that he has been for a long while failing in health. He has had some very bad falls on the platform of the American Tract Society, and American Sunday School Union, and American Board of Foreign Missions, and Christian Endeavor Meetings. Besides this he has been very much reduced in strength by a spare diet. Refusing to take the strong meat of the Word, and the bread of life, he has confined himself to creeds and liturgies and catechisms. He got weaker and weaker until now he is dead. A post mortem examination revealed the fact that his spleen was very much enlarged, and his liver was surcharged with bile, and the two alarming protuberances on his head turned out to be a couple of horns in state of embryo. No public announcement was made either of his decease or his burial. The overseer of the poor took charge of his remains as he did not leave enough to pay his funeral expenses. Some of our best clergymen and laymen served as pallbearers, not because they had any affection for the departed, but because they thought it better to get him out of the way. The funeral sermon was preached from a text in the Old Testament. "Buried with the burial of an ass drawn forth and cast beyond the streets of Jerusalem." Requiescat in pace!

THE BIBLE AND THE NEWSPAPER

Two Famous Veterans.

ONE of the most interesting pictures for the future historian, who will write the history of this wonderful nineteenth century, will be the photograph reproduced on this page. It represents Prince Bismarck of Germany and Li Hung Chang, the foremost statesman of China. The latter is now on a visit to Europe and expects to come to America before he returns to his native land. He was sent by the Emperor of China to represent him at the coronation of the Russian Czar. From St. Petersburg and Moscow, he went to Berlin and after paying his respects to Emperor William, he traveled to Friedrichsruhe to visit Prince Bismarck. The meeting of the two statesmen was extremely cordial and must have been interesting to both, as they have been in official correspondence for more than thirty years. The photograph of them was taken as they stood on the balcony of Prince Bismarck's residence. Singularly unlike each other in appearance, there is a strong similarity in their characters and there are points of resemblance in their careers. Both have given their lives to the development of their respective countries and have practically governed them through a long course of years, and both in their old age have experienced the vicissitudes of imperial favor. The history of Germany during this century is largely what Bismarck made and all the progress that China has made during the same period is due to the efforts of Li Hung Chang. There is a difference of five years in their ages, Prince Bismarck having attained his fifty-second year, while Li is only seventy-seven. Both have therefore passed the age at which some ecclesiastical authorities pronounce their servants "non-effective" yet they continue to wield an influence and to retain a mental vigor which it would not be wise to underestimate. There appears to have been a frankness about their conversation, which, on the part of the Chinese statesman, was probably due to his inexperience of European newspaper enterprise. If Li Hung Chang had been aware that his utterances would be carried by telegraph and read all over the world, he would scarcely have asked Prince Bismarck what was the best way of acting successfully against the influence of the monarch and his friends. The German statesman has, it is true, had a experience which qualifies him to give an opinion on the subject, but he must have been amused at his visitor's idea that he would give it so openly. With the diplomatic tact Bismarck told him that the statesman could not hope to act against the Emperor. He could only give advice which the Emperor might, or might not, accept. He then steered the conversation away from this delicate ground to a safer subject of health and exercise, and the two aged men compared notes as to their physical strength. The fact of his asking the question, however, when it is known at Pekin, is not likely to increase Li Hung Chang's popularity at court. Here, as at Berlin, the statesman who wishes to find out how to thwart the royal will is not considered a desirable servant. Nevertheless, he may be the best and best a ruler could have, seeing that a throne does not necessarily give wisdom to the man who occupies it. A statesman who trusted implicitly to the wisdom of the king he serves might make a blunder and do his country irreparable injury. It is not with the servants of kings as it is with the servants of God.

Whose putteth his trust in the Lord shall be safe. (Prov. 29: 25.)

An Old Prescription.

The clerk of a drug store in Boston, Mass., had some difficulty in executing an order given him a few days ago. The Herald of that city says that a venerable lady, who lives in Connecticut, but pays periodical visits to Boston, called at the store and asked if she could have a prescription dispensed there. She did not have the prescription, but it had been made up at the store some years ago and had been copied into the books of the firm. She was told that if she could tell them the date, or give some clue to the prescription—and the girl was unable to keep her head above the surface. Some boys would have left her to drown, but this one had inventive faculty, as well as kindness of disposition. He lowered himself over the side of the cistern, keeping a firm grip with his hands of the coping at the top. His feet were within a few inches of the surface of the water, and he called to the drowning child to clasp them. She did so and, thus supported, could keep herself from sinking. The boy's shouts for help soon attracted attention, and, some men coming to his aid, he and the girl were hauled out of the cistern. Many a poor soul in danger of perishing eternally has been saved in a similar way. Some compassionate Christian has gone down to them in their extremity and has kept them from being submerged, until permanent rescue came through Christ.

Fear not, believe only and she shall be made whole. (Luke 8:30.)

tion, they could renew it. She returned the next day, bringing an old-fashioned glass bottle, bearing the firm's name and the number of the prescription. The clerk made a search for it, and at last found it in a book which showed that the last time it was made up was April 30, 1847, nearly fifty years ago. He dispensed it again and the old lady was delighted to have the medicine. We may infer that it was something she kept by her for emergencies. If it had been medicine for frequent use, one bottle would not have lasted her for forty-nine years. Some people act so with religion. In time of danger, or some dire calamity, or at the approach of death, they pray to God, but while things go well with them they forget him:

Lord, in trouble have they visited thee; they poured out a prayer when thy chastening was upon them. (Isa. 26: 16.)

A Boy Rescuer.

A little girl of Bayonne, N. J., owes her life to the presence of mind and courage of a village lad. The child, who is only seven years old, was sent a few days ago to a cistern near her home for a pail of water. In drawing it up she lost her balance and fell head foremost into the cistern. A fifteen-year-old boy who was passing at the moment, witnessed the mishap and ran to her rescue. But the child was beyond his reach. There was no time to get a ladder, or to go for help, for the water was deep

My sheep hear my voice and they follow me, and I give unto them eternal life and they shall never perish. (John 10: 27.)

Reunited After Forty Years.

A singular reunion of two brothers took place in New York recently. They had not met before in forty years and each believed the other dead. When they were children they lost both their parents, but they had an uncle, a workingman in New York, who brought them up until they were able to earn their own living. They were steady and industrious, and both grew to manhood with the respect of their associates. They each joined the old Volunteer Fire Department and ran with the machine until 1855. In that year the younger brother came in contact with a man who had been out in California and had made money by mining. He was about to return, and the young man decided to go with him. After his departure, his brother had several letters from him, but the answers appear to have missed him, and as he was living an exciting life among the miners, he ceased to write. About a year afterward a New York man appeared at the mines who told the young man that his brother was dead. He, too, had been a fireman and he said he had attended the funeral. He had really attended the funeral of a man of that name, but it was of the cousin not the brother of the young miner. But the mistake was not found out. The young man mourned his brother as dead. He remained in California until the war broke out, when he enlisted and continued in service until the close. He returned to California, where the regiment was disbanded and resumed his old occupation. A few years ago, aged, broken in health, and suffering from old wounds received in battle, he secured admission to a Soldiers' Home. There, one day, he saw in a New York newspaper a reference to his brother. It occurred in the obituary notice of a deceased fireman, who, it appeared, had in the last years of his life been indebted to him for many kindnesses. The news seemed too good to be true, but on telegraphing to New York he learned that his brother was indeed alive and now in their old age the two brothers have been reunited. This is not the first time by many that kindness done with no hope of reward, has resulted in a great joy. In this case, the promise to those who show magnanimity and brotherly love was fulfilled in a sense more literal than was implied.

Thou hast gained thy brother. (Matt. 18: 15.)

Care for a Parasite.

A circular letter has been issued to the citizens of Brooklyn, N. Y., by the Secretary of the Tree-Planting and Fountain Society warning them against destroying the cocoons of the Tussock moth. As this moth has been a great nuisance in Brooklyn in other years, the circular would have been a surprise if there had been no explanation of it. The reason for leaving the cocoons unmolested is that they contain eggs of an ichneumonid parasite.

They come from a small black fly, slender, like a wasp and quick in its movements. It lays its eggs on the cocoon of the Tussock moth, where they develop and feed on the chrysalides within. Thus instead of the chrysalides of the Tussock moth developing into moths to deposit eggs, which will become the voracious caterpillars that destroy the trees and swarm over the fences and houses, they become the prey of the parasite and the plague is stayed. The circular points out that as it is desirable to have as many of the parasite flies as possible, in order to be rid of the destructive caterpillars, it will be well to leave the cocoons undisturbed. But for this warning a citizen concerned for the welfare of the trees might destroy cocoons containing the parasite and thus defeat his own object. Perhaps if irreverent critics of the divine government had fuller knowledge, they might find a similar reason for facts on which they now base their blasphemous reproaches. Even the Christian sometimes wonders that an omnipotent God should suffer evil to exist, when he could destroy it by an act of his power; but we may be assured that God knows better than we how to destroy it effectually. His servants, eager to destroy the bane, might destroy the antidote, but he, like the householder in the Parable, restrains their ignorant zeal and says:

Nay lest while ye gather up the tares, ye root up also the wheat with them. Let both grow together until the harvest. (Matt. 13: 30.)

RUNNING THE GAUNTLET

Or the Shield of a Christian Mother's Influence.

By W. E. S. Baker.

CHAPTER I.

The Sunday School Picnic.

SIXTY or more children, with laughing eyes, climbed a grassy slope on the edge of a beautiful grove one bright summer afternoon, singing, "Old Mother Tiptytoe! Old Mother Tiptytoe! I don't care whether I work or no!"

They were nearly all girls, although here and there among the smaller children whom the larger ones held firmly by their hands, a boy might have been seen by the side of his "big sister." All of them were happy as princes, not knowing of the faulty grammar in their childish song, or, if knowing it, not caring a fig.

"Mother Tiptytoe" was about fifty feet in advance of the little ones, and near the top of the hill. She was a woman of small stature, carrying a willow stick, on which she leaned for support in her pretended lameness, and looking like a homely old woman; her blue cloak turned inside out, and a shabby old straw hat adding to the oddity of her appearance.

Suddenly, as the children approached nearer to her, she turned about, showed an angry, scowling face, and throwing her arms and cane into the air in a threatening manner, and muttering cross words, hastily ran towards the little ones as if to overtake and punish them.

Of course the youngsters, with screams and laughter, scampered down the hill at full speed, the smallest of them thinking it all in earnest. While "Mother Tiptytoe" appeared to be doing her utmost to catch them, yet, from her assumed age and lameness, she was never enabled to touch the hindmost child, until all had reached the bottom of the hill; when old, lame and infirm Mother Tiptytoe threw off her outward coverings, a handsome woman of thirty stood before them, her eyes brightened by the exertion, and her face aglow with pleasure.

"O! teacher, it is so nice, won't you do it just once more?" said a sweet child of ten years, as she went to the lady, put her hot cheek upon her breast, and asked for another turn of "Mother Tiptytoe."

"You are all too warm and tired, my dears; had we not better look at the others play awhile?"

Close by them a number of men and boys were kicking an immense rubber ball up and down the woods. Now it would be flying far up among the tree-tops; now dashing into a coterie of misses—who scattered as if a bomb-shell had exploded in their midst, now bounding over the uneven surface of the ground followed by the laughing, shouting, panting, perspiring, kicking crowd.

Still another party was playing baseball in a field on the edge of the grove; while hand-balls and bean-bags were bouncing through the air in every direction; boys, girls, and adults all pitching, playing and catching, enjoying intensely the annual picnic of the Brookdale Sabbath School.

From several parts of the grove could be heard the songs of the girls, as they swung "around a rosy," and, while their songs and plays were more sensible, they also had a more practical ending.

Two hours later in the day, when the sun and little were playing "Princess" Base, surrounded by a large crowd of interested spectators—when the crack of the croquet balls; the loud blast of the "hunt the hare" horn; the distant ring of the quoits; the cracking of swings; the ice-cream trucks; the merry laughter, the laughing and shouting from hundreds of joyous hearts, all told of the happy hours that were passing. "Mother Tiptytoe" might have been seen sitting on a bench close by a large ring of girls and boys, who were singing and playing. "Down in the meadow where the green grass grows."

She was reading quietly, and yet kept an eye on the children, several of whom were in her class in the school.

The same little girl who had previously addressed her, suddenly left her companions at the rope, and with a red cheek and panting breast, came to her teacher, Mrs. Seymour, the lady who had personated "Mother Tiptytoe," and, putting her face in the woman's lap, and kneeling before her, said: "Oh, teacher, I'm so tired, mayn't I stay near you a little while?"

"Yes, Carrie, dear: you do look hot and tired," replied the teacher; "get upon the bench and put your head in my lap."

The child, who was a lovely girl, with sunny brown hair and hazel eyes, quietly did as she was requested, and was soon asleep.

How soon and how sweetly comes repose to the eyes of the innocent, in the guileless, happy days of childhood; before the love of pleasure, the cares of the world, or the deceitfulness of riches injure our bodies, absorb our minds and sear our consciences!

Mrs. Seymour smoothed the warm brow of the child, and with her delicate fingers played with the silken, chestnut curls. Then her thoughts went back to her own early married life; to her husband, who had died some years before; to a dear little daughter, whom she had clasped to her bosom in its infancy, but which had then been snatched from her in a strange, almost mysterious manner. What a comfort would it be to have her darling baby girl with her now; for, had she lived, she would have been just of the age of little Carrie Walter. The widow, as a woman, lamented the loss of her darling pet, yet, as a Christian, she could not but say: "Just and true are thy ways, thou King of saints."

She looked down upon the little sleeper, and wiped a tear from her own cheek, as the child opened her soft eyes, and looking up into Mrs. Seymour's face, as she fondly nestled closer to her, said softly, but beseechingly:

"Teacher, won't you come to our house and be my mamma? I do love you so much, and I want to be a good girl, but I have no mamma to tell me, and—"

"Is not your papa very kind to you, Carrie? If you want to be a good little girl, papa will help you. Besides, the Lord Jesus promises to be a brother to you, if you trust in him."

"Yes, teacher, but I want a mamma. My papa is kind, but he is away so often on business. The girls beat me, and call me stupid, and make me sleep in a dark, cold room. Papa once was rich, oh! ever so rich; then he lost his money and we became poor. Now he is working hard to get rich again, and says we soon will be."

After a brief pause, she continued: "I go to our barnyard and see the hen, calling her little chickens, and they come right to their mamma, and gather under her wings, and look so nice. Then our pussy, she meows to the dear little turtle shell kitties, and they come to her and get warm. A robin has built a nest just under my chamber window, and I see the mother bringing the food to the little birdies, and feeding them so kindly, and covering them with her wings to keep off the rain; but, Oh! teacher, I have no mamma to cover and love me, and I wish I was dead! I feel so lonesome, Oh! I have no mamma, no mamma."

Here the child sobbed and pressed her face and arms still closer to the tender-hearted widow, who could not restrain her tears; partly from pure sympathy with the confiding, sweet little creature that nestled in her bosom, and partly because of sorrowful remembrance of another little birdie, which had taken its flight heavenward when newly fledged.

"My little dear must try to think of happier things," replied the widow, stooping down and kissing the child on the forehead. The good Lord knows that little Carrie has no mamma, and he will take care of her, just as the kind shepherd looks after his sheep."

"But will the good Lord give me a mamma?" innocently asked the little one. "Will you not, teacher, come to our house and be my mamma?"

This was a curious question for a handsome young widow of thirty to answer, especially when the father of little Carrie was known to be a wealthy and enterprising man, and a widower, respected by everybody; so she adroitly evaded the answer by saying:

"My child is fretting herself too much. She must continue to be good; and we will all love her, and do all we can to make her happy."

The child was not so easily quieted, for again reaching up her face close to the widow's, and opening her large eyes, she looked straight into Mrs. Seymour's face, with a loving, pleading look, and said, as she kissed her on the cheek:

"My papa will drive down to take me home this evening; mayn't I ask him, teacher, to take you home to be my mamma? Oh! I do want a mamma so much! I never had a mamma."

The widow could no longer endure this, and noticing her only child close by, sought a diversion from her dilemma by appealing to him:

"Milton, my dear, come here."

The boy, although at that moment deeply engaged in his game, and with a boy's energy was shouting: "Shinny on your own side, there!" dropped his crook in an instant, and came to his mother; and a noble, manly, polite fellow he was, some eleven or twelve years of age.

"Milton, this is Carrie Walter, one of my scholars. I want you to take her down to the meadow. She is not well, and the cool air will do her good."

Carrie and Milton were friends at first sight, and as she arose, adjusted her hair, and put on her hat, the young gallant gracefully offered his arm, which Carrie, not without blushing, accepted. They had not proceeded far when she met several squads of her young companions, for she was a popular and loved child, and a great favorite with them.

"It's real mean, Carrie Walter, that you don't come and play," said one of the girls. "I guess she would rather play with the boys," insinuated a sharp-eyed vixen of ten summers, as she stuffed her white apron into her mouth, half ashamed of her remark.

Neither Carrie nor Milton cared for public opinion, but, liking each other from the start, they wandered outside of the bounds prescribed by Mrs. Seymour, and were happy as only children can be.

"Carrie," said Milton, "what were you crying about awhile ago?"

"Well, maybe I shouldn't tell you," said the little diplomat, not feeling the freedom in speaking to the son, which she had felt in addressing his mother.

"Because," resumed Milton, stretching himself up, and assuming a manly, dignified bearing, "if anybody insulted you, I'm the man to take it up!"

These were big words from a lad of one decade, and his high chivalric notions were somewhat demolished by Carrie's honest reply:

"No, Milton, that was not it. You see, I have no mamma, and your mamma was telling me about Jesus who—"

"Well, what of that?" abruptly broke in Milton, "I have no papa, so we are even."

"Then," said Carrie, innocently, and forgetting all about Jesus and his lambs, "if you have no papa, while I have one, and I have no mamma, while you have, why cannot your mamma be my mamma, and my papa be your papa? I'm going to tell him about it, when he comes to take me home, and ask him to take her along, for I do love her ever so much. Then, when papa is away on business, you can drive me out with the horses and carriage, and we will be so happy, and have a nice time. Wouldn't you like to be my brother? Your mamma told me that she knew of a friend that would stick 'closer than a brother.' I wonder if you are the one she spoke about? I feel so lonesome, that I do want somebody to live at our house, as the servant girls tell me naughty things, and make me have frightful dreams."

"Well, little Carrie, don't you fret so much. My mother is a good woman, that's a fact, and I guess I'm the man she referred to, and I do like you so much as any brother, and more too."

"But when you get to be a big man, you will not like me then?" inquired the youngster, raising her eyebrows inquiringly.

"Yes, I will, Carrie; you just trust, and see if I don't. When I get to be a man, you will be a woman. Do you think you will always like me?"

"Yes, I think I will," answered Carrie, with some hesitation.

"You must like me better than any other boy in the world, Carrie, or else I cannot like you at all!"

Just then, after crossing the Wingohocking, they arrived at a lovely glade in the edge of the grove, where a beech spread its branches overhead, and seemed to invite them to seats beneath its cool shade. Milton took out his pocket-knife and began to cut his initials in the white bark of the tree.

As a seal of faithfulness to each other, Milton also cut Carrie's initials beneath his—"C. W.," and when finished, they walked around the tree and viewed the initials, two happier beings, perhaps never walked the earth. Too young, too innocent to know of the tricks and captions of modern courtship, while drinking the blissful cup of children's love; yet to realize that life brings its cares, anxieties, its temptations and sorrows, sin and death.

"Halloo! there, Seymour, that's cousin you're talking to," came in a strong voice from the branches of the beech tree under which Carrie and Milton were sitting, and a boy swung himself to sward beneath, after having been quick hiding there, a silent witness of the proceedings beneath.

"Cousin George, you're real mean; ugly, and I don't like you a bit," said Carrie.

"All right, Cousin Carrie, but I am your cousin, you know, and the proper way to take care of you. I will take care of you, so," turning to the other who was standing close by, looking troubled and confused, "Seymour, I can go back to your mother. I will see my cousin."

"But my mamma told me that I must take care of Carrie," said Milton.

A simple solution of the difficulty was given by both boys to have accompanied the little lady back to the parlor, but such a solution did not commend itself to the boys. The words grew more angry every moment, and at last a blow was struck, and they were fighting fiercely. It was a short, sharp struggle and both were hurt. Boy-like, they went side by side the river bank to wash away the traces of the encounter, and as Milton was the one who had a handkerchief in his pocket it was used by both.

Having made themselves as presentable as they could they went with shamefaced backs to the party avoiding the other children and making their way straight to Widow Seymour, who saw from the blood-stained clothes that they had been fighting; so, sending Carrie off to play, she took the boys aside, and spoke to them:

"My dear boys, I will not ask you to begin this disgraceful affair, because, generally speaking, it takes two to make a quarrel, and I will assume that both of you are to blame. Now do you know that to fight is very sinful! You know what the Bible says about fighting: 'Whoever is angry with his brother without cause shall be in danger of the judgment. And whoever is angry with his brother and does not seek to be reconciled to him, shall be in danger of the judgment. And whoever is angry with his brother and does not seek to be reconciled to him, shall be in danger of the judgment.' 'A fool's lips entangle him in contention and his mouth calls for strokes.' This is true, boys. Every sin and crime may come from strife. Jealousy and disagreement lead to angry words; then to blows; then to injury, and even murder. When two boys or men fight they are not quite sane and they have wicked feelings. The Bible tells us of one case where two men fought, and one of them in his anger cursed and blasphemed, and the Lord God ordered that they should be stoned to death! Besides this, boys, the great apostle Paul said that wrath and hatred and strife keep boys away from heaven! The Scriptures everywhere command us to be peaceful, to love and to help one another; and Jesus went further, and told us to love even our enemies, and do good to them that treat us badly! So I hope, neither of you will ever fight again. It may end in a crime which will blacken your lives, and leave you in hope for eternity."

Milton Seymour was softened by his mother's words, and promised not to fight again. But George Brown was stubborn and unmoved.

The Conquest of Temptation.

Suggestions on the Christian Endeavor
Topic for the Week Beginning August 9.
Ps. 6: 10-18.

WE cannot exaggerate the importance of the power which the Apostle shows the way to attain. He tells his readers how they may stand in the evil day, and having done all, to stand. How many men there are in every land, and how many have been in every age, who want to know just that! In the presence of evil—intemperance, gambling, unchastity, dishonesty, the willing victims are comparatively few. It is every drunkard who says, "When I awake I will seek it again." It is not every man who yields cheerfully to temptation. There are more heroes than we have any idea of who yield after a struggle who resist until they are overcome, and the enemy is defeated by the traitor within. Every one is familiar with this struggle between duty and inclination in some form or other, and the knowledge of the fact should make us sympathetic with the evil-doer as with a man who has been defeated in a contest in which the better part of his nature was fighting on the right side. We are apt to treat him as a moral leper, a man who must be avoided almost out, when we should treat him as one who has had to contend with forces that were too strong for him, like one who has had to defend his position from assault with one hand while he holds a tiger by the throat with the other. The ancient city was built on the hill raised, is the way of which of our character-building. Every man labors with his idols and carries a weapon. He is to fight as well as to win. Sometimes he must use the weapon in successive conflicts and only in the intervals can he use his tools. To men who want to fight this battle and win it, the Apostle gives words of advice.

With the custom current in his day, Paul personifies the enemy against whom the Christian has to contend. In our day we think of the enemy as an abstract principle. The Apostle views the struggle as a duel after him, as one with the enemy of the human race, a powerful and malignant being with subtle forces at his command. Whether we assume the existence of such a being or not, we can have no doubt as to the necessity of a struggle before we can live a right and true life. It is not easy to do good. When the struggle commences in youth, it is hard, but where its beginning is delayed, its severity increases, and every year afterwards renders the conflict more fierce and the prospects of victory more doubtful. But for young or old the Apostle has the same directions. The Christian at Ephesus, like the Christian of the modern American age, must be equipped in the same way if he is to succeed. He can win if he will don "the whole armor of God." Paul has been a gladiator, compelled to fight wild beasts for the amusement of the populace. He remembers how he was equipped, and he finds in his Lord's arsenal as effective an equipment for the spiritual conflict. He has truth to strengthen him, righteousness to protect him, the Gospel to and upon, faith to turn aside the missile of the enemy, salvation as a guard, the Scriptures as a weapon, and continual prayer as an unfailing resource. So equipped the Apostle believes the Christian to be invincible.

The Better Land.

I KNOW not where those temples lift
Their burnished spires in air,
I know not where the glory beams,
So marvelously fair.
I cannot see the waving hands
Upon that farther shore.
I cannot hear the rapturous songs
Of loved ones gone before.
But dimmed and blinded earthly eyes,
Washed clear by contrite tears,
Catch glimpses of eternal light
From the eternal years.
When morn has flushed the eastern sky
And crowned the joyous day,

The splendor of ten thousand suns
Fades into space away,
When God's light shines into the soul—
A glory wondrous bright
All earthly objects fade away
Like stars in morning light.
All worldliness will flee apace,
All earthly idols fall,
Till all the dross is burned away,
And God is all in all.
There is a rapture of the soul,
The joy of sins forgiven.
For Christ, the Blessed, reigns within,
And where he is 'tis heaven.

The Two Witnesses.

The Identity and Character of the Two Mysterious Prophets of the Last Days.

BY MRS. M. BAXTER.

THE ministry of Elijah the prophet, foretold by Malachi, has yet to be fulfilled. It is a striking fact that the Jews, up to the present day, in their observance of the Passover feast, place a cup of wine for the coming Elijah, and leave the door open; it is also a striking fact that a number of the early fathers of the Christian Church believed that Elijah and Enoch should come again and seal their testimony with their blood during the days of Antichrist. Enoch and Elijah are the only two men who have never died: they stand as those shall "stand before the Son of Man" who shall "prevail to escape those things which shall come to pass" in the time of trouble (Luke 21: 36). They have not yet fallen under death.

During the days of their testimony nothing harms these two witnesses, but no sooner is it come to an end than they succumb to death at the hand of the beast, or Anti-christ, who has come up out of the abyss as they have come down from heaven. Their death is the signal for great rejoicing and merry making among them that dwell on the earth, and the corpses of these witnesses of God shall be publicly exhibited as the great trophies of the Anti-christ's victories. There is something very awful in this description of the terrible malignity of the persecutors in leaving the bodies of the witnesses unburied, and in their daring levity at such a juncture. A universal holiday will celebrate their death, because these two prophets "tormented them that dwell on the earth."

But the triumph of the wicked is short. While thousands are exulting in what they have deemed a victory over the God whom they have rebelled against, and while jokes and sneers and every indignity are being offered to the still forms of the martyred prophets, those forms begin to move. "The breath of life from God" enters into them: they arise, no man daring to touch them; they stand upon their feet. In the midst of the awful hush which comes upon the trembling throng, a great voice from heaven commands them, "Come up hither." And, like their Lord and like those who shall be alive and left unto His coming, and who are ready and waiting for him, they go up into heaven in the cloud and their enemies behold them. They have rejected the last testimony; they have doubly sealed their doom and soon the voice of the seventh angel will sound the last trumpet, and "the mystery of God shall be finished."

When the Manchild ascends, the dragon is cast down: the witnesses ascend, and the earth is shaken. But terror does not convert men. Like the magicians of Egypt, when they said, "This is the finger of God" (Ex. 8: 19), and yet did not turn to the Lord, so those who "obey not the Gospel" may be startled with a sudden terror, and acknowledge God for the moment: but the issue shows that the impression is but temporary, and judgment must go on to the bitter end. The long-suffering of God will at length have an end. "The second woe is past; behold, the third woe cometh quickly."

THE PITY OF IT.*

WE may take warning of the danger of setting our affections on the things of this world and making ourselves believe that the treasures of greatest value are worldly possessions. In Judas the need for wealth grew day by day, until last he sold his Master for thirty pieces of silver. A physician told me the other day that one of the most terrible things he ever saw was a man afflicted with diabetes, in which the predominant passion came into supreme control. This man could sit for hours and hours at a table, counting off with his fingers many bills, ever and anon announcing to himself the number of thousands and millions of dollars which in his mind's eye he saw piled up in heaps on the table before him. Once the doctor came in unexpectedly. The man glanced up, but when counting until he had finished counted thousands of dollars. Then he came with flashing, excited eyes, and said: "My ship has just come in this morning! Splendid cargo! A great fortune for me!"

Mr. Moody tells a similar story of a man out of our insane asylums who walked down in the mad-house constantly crying, "If I only had!" That was his cry from morning till night in all his waking hours. His story was this: He was employed by a railroad company to take care of a swing-bridge, and he received a despatch from the superintendent that an extra train would pass over the bridge and that he must not turn the bridge while the train had passed. One afternoon he came and tried to have him open the bridge, and he refused to do it. At last the train came and over-persuaded him, and he opened the bridge. He had no other plan done so, when he heard the whining. There was not time to close the bridge, and he saw the train leap, with its living freight, into the abyss of death. His reason reeled and tottered up to the throne, and the man went mad. His cry was: "If I only had! If I only had!" It was the terror of poor Judas, remorse and remorse awoke within him and would give him no peace.

History is told of a gentleman who was standing, one morning, on the platform of the Grand Central Railroad Station, New York City, holding the hand of a little girl, only seven years old. There was some slight detention about getting the car in which they wished to ride, the child stood looking quietly and patiently, interested in all she saw, when the sound of the measured tramp of a heavy foot made her turn and look behind her. There she saw a sight such as the young eyes had never looked on before—a short procession of six policemen, in whom marched first, followed by others between whom (chained to the wrists of each), walked a fierce-looking man, and these were followed by two men who came close behind the dangerous prisoner. The man was one of the most infamous in the city. He had committed a terrible crime, and was on his way to the State prison, to be locked up for the rest of his life. The little girl heard of him, and she knew who he was, for only that morning her father had said he would have to be sent up to prison guarded, for it had been suspected that some of his comrades would try to rescue him from the officers. The little girl halted quite near her. Her father, who was talking with a friend, did not notice her. The child stood and watched the man with a strange, choking feeling in her throat, and a pitiful look in her eyes. It seemed so very, very sad to think of his one ride in the sunshine by the banks of the river, the poor man, all his life, would be shut up in a gloomy prison, no matter how long he might live. Even if he should become an old, old man, he could never walk in the bright sunlight of a free man again. All at once the prisoner looked at her, and then turned suddenly away. But in another moment he glanced back, as if he could not resist the sweet pity of that childish face. He watched it for an instant, his features working curiously the while, and then turned his head with an impatient motion that told the little girl that she had annoyed him. Her tender little heart was sorry in a moment, and, starting forward, she went up close to the dangerous man, and said, earnestly: "I didn't mean to plague you, poor man; only I'm sorry for you; and Jesus is sorry for you, too." One of the policemen caught her up quickly, and gave her to her father, who had already sprung forward to stop her. No one had caught the quick words she had uttered save the man to whom they were spoken. But he had heard them, and their echo, with the picture of that tender, grieved child's face, went with him through all that long ride, and passed beside into that dreary cell. The keeper wondered greatly that his dreaded prisoner made no trouble, and that as time passed on he grew gentler and more kindly every day. But the wonder was explained when, some months after, the chaplain asked him how it was that he had turned out such a different man from what they had expected. "It is a simple story," said the man. "A child was sorry for me, and she told me that Jesus was sorry for me, too, and her pity and his broke my heart."

Tarabin, the Hindo Child Hunter.*

THE whole household was in a state of excitement and confusion, but within half-an-hour, to their relief, the wheels of the carriage were heard, and Mr. Vasudevav appeared. The telegram was at once handed to him. He opened it and read, "Brother dangerously ill, come immediately." His face turned pale and he looked at his watch. It was half-past eight. Kakubai and Anandibai ventured to come out and asked what was the matter. "Dinnanath is ill, and I must go by tonight's train."

Anandibai immediately rushed into the kitchen and served dinner for her husband. Then she put a few things in a bag, while Mr. Vasudevav looked to see if he had sufficient money, and snatching the bag, he jumped into the carriage which had been ordered to return, and drove to the Victoria Station.

Anandibai lay awake by her daughter's side until early morning, when she managed to get sleep for about an hour. Kakubai was simply prostrate. Every now and then she would exclaim: "Oh Narayan! What will happen to Dinnath? Oh! do not make his wife a widow I beseech of Thee, O God." She would, however, resign herself by saying, "We must submit to Fate."

It was a sad night, indeed; but all rose early and went about the daily duties. Mr. Vasudevav did not write or telegraph. He had gone, and with his return, he would bring the news, whether good or bad, and the poor, anxious people in the house waited for his return every day. On the fifth day two carriages drove to the door in the early morning. Mr. Vasudevav got out of the first one; and, without saying a word, walked in, and flung himself on a sofa in a disturbed manner. Out of the second carriage a most astonishing and pitiful figure stepped out, and seated herself on the ground, weeping loudly. Then, bending her head, which was shaved but covered with her "padar," she knocked it against a huge stone, and became desperate with grief. Anandibai and Kakubai rushed to the door and beheld Dinnanath's widow. They shuddered at the sight. In the study they found Mr. Vasudevav prostrate but silent. The two ladies gave way to their feelings, but Vasudevav, with emotion, told them to be quiet, and to take in the poor girl for his brother's sake. Then Kakubai wailed loudly, and said: "The wretch has swallowed our Dinu! Why did she marry him? To eat him up in this way! Why hast thou brought this ill-luck into the house? She will surely swallow someone here. Our Dinu has gone, and she is nothing to us now;" and the poor old lady shook and wailed most pitifully. The young widow again knocked her forehead against a stone in desperate grief. She would have indeed preferred to have followed her husband on the funeral pile. Her life was a blank now. The light—the god of her life—was no more. "What is the use of living!" thought she. She fell backwards and appealed to the god of death. "Oh, Death! carry me away," exclaimed the poor, stricken creature; and with the last word she fainted away. For two hours there was utter confusion. Naturally, the fainting and falling attracted the people of the house, and the servant was ordered to bring some water, which was sprinkled on her face; and when she came to herself, she was led into the veranda, where she sat down—a sight of pity and misery.

The whole house now went into mourning, except Ratanbai, who no longer belonged to her own family, having been already married into another. The ladies were in the inner apartment, and friends, caste brothers and sisters came in hundreds to pay visits of condolence. Mr. Vasudevav kept in his office room, whither the gentlemen came. The ladies came and sat beside the mourners Anandibai and Kakubai. The young widow was in an inner apartment, prostrate on the ground. The mourners wept, and the visitors wept, and then the poor widow wailed loudly.

The Famous Matterhorn Peak.

FIVE gigantic icy mountain peaks, towering above all others, are the prominent features of the great Alpine chain known as the Pennine Alps, in southern Switzerland. These five, at whose feet lie thirty-two other mountains, are Mont Blanc, the Weisshorn, the Mischabelhorn, Monk Rosa and the Matterhorn. All are over 14,000 feet in height, Monk Rosa, the highest, piercing the clouds at an altitude of 15,217. The Matterhorn, 14,780 feet, one of the noblest Alpine peaks, and which is shown in the photographic illustration on the opposite page, has been the scene of many attempted ascensions, but not until July 15, 1865, when Mr. Edward Whymper and several others reached the summit was the snowy giant conquered. During the descent four of the party were killed. Since that event several successful ascensions have been made, but it is so steep and precipitous that few dare attempt it.

An Algerian Betrothal.

Also Some of the Pleasant Social Amenities of Life in that Country.

ONE of the most entertaining of travelers who have recently visited Algeria, is Mme Dralla, a French lady. She went there a young bride, to whom everything was bright and new and full of interest. With a woman's quick powers of observation, she noted what she saw, and the result is a delightful pen-picture of Algerian domestic life. She dwelt at Bone, a somewhat important seaport, in a house upon whose flat roof she and her husband drank their coffee every morning and enjoyed the cool sea-breeze. By slow degrees she became acquainted with her Algerian neighbors. They bade her “Aseemah,” (good morning), from their roofs, in a tongue she could not understand, though she guessed at its purport. Some blessed her, while others cursed her for a Christian. The children called “Roumi! Roumi!” indicating that they knew she belonged to the race that had conquered their country.

“I bade my servant bring me lumps of sugar and other sweets,” she writes, “and

I threw these to the children. But lo! the whole party, old and young, mothers and children, rushed to pick them up! The rules of native politeness enjoin this, and having eaten the dainties, they all put their fingers in their mouths to thank me. A few hours afterwards, one of my neighbors (whose husband possibly wished to stand well with mine), sent me some coffee berries, some crumbs of bread and a pinch of salt. These gifts were intended to convey a message thus: ‘Coffee—May thy life be bright. Bread—May'st thou never be in need. Salt—May disease never touch thee.’ I returned the compliment by sending her a match, a cake, and an egg; which signified: ‘May thy beauty shine in the eyes of a brave man. May'st thou be fed on the best of the land. Hidden by thy white veil, may'st thou bring comfort and life around thee.’ It was all I could do. I was never able to call on her.”

Mme. Dralla thus describes an Algerian bridal: Fatma and Ali, two young acquaintances, were to be betrothed. The father of the bridegroom was to pay a sum of money agreed on, and receive a receipt from the father of the girl—practically a certificate sealed by the cadi. The father of the girl and the bridegroom then sit on the ground, face to face, grasping one another's right hand, raising the thumbs and pressing them one against the other. The father of the girl says, “I betroth to thee my daughter, So-and-So, for a dowry of such an amount.” The bridegroom answers, “I accept from thee the betrothal to myself.” While these words are being spoken, a muezzin or a schoolmaster puts a handkerchief on the two united hands, and when the last word is said he recites a short prayer in praise of God, a form of blessing and some verses on marriage. Two or three days later the wedding takes place.

“On the wedding day a professional ‘beauty-dresser’ came forward to do her duty to the bride, who, poor child, looked frightened and amazed. She yielded her tiny hands and feet to be painted with the deep orange-red tint imparted by the leaves of the ‘henna;’ her nails were made perfectly black, but the back of both hands and feet were left of their native hue. On her head was placed a red, dome-shaped cap, sparkling with sequins and gold embroidery. This cap covered most of her hair, and left disclosed a fringe over her forehead and two long locks by her ears. Jewels were put on arms and ankles, and a necklace was fastened about her throat. When thus fully adorned, she was instructed to walk before us, that all might have full and equal opportunity of admiring her. She obeyed slowly and with a peculiar gait, inclining the lower part of her body from side to side as she walked, while with her hands she slightly raised the edges of her outer garments.

“Then the women veiled themselves. The bridegroom was coming out, and met Fatma at the foot of the staircase. He blew in her face to teach her submission, and put over her head a golden piece to pay the beauty-dresser, thus assuming his responsibility for her.”

A MORNING SCENE AT THE "FOUNTAIN OF THE VIRGIN," NAZARETH, PALESTINE. (See Page 574.)

THE METROPOLITAN PULPIT

THE GLOW OF SUNSET.

A Sermon by Rev. T. DeWitt Talmage, D.D., on the Text: Luke 24: 29, "Abide with us, for it is toward evening."

W O villagers, having concluded their errand in Jerusalem, have started out at the city gate and are on their way to Emmaus, the place of their residence. They go with a sad heart. Jesus, who had been their admiration and their joy, had been basely massacred and entombed. As with sad face and broken heart they pass on their way, a stranger accosts them. They tell him their anxieties and bitterness of soul. He in turn talks to them, mightily expounding the Scriptures. He throws over them the fascination of intelligent conversation. They forget the time, and notice not the objects they pass, and before they are aware, have come up in front of their house. They pause before the entrance and attempt to persuade the stranger to tarry with them. They press upon him their hospitalities. Night is coming on, and he may meet a prowling wild beast, or be obliged to lie unsheltered from the dew. He cannot go much further now. Why not stop there, and continue their pleasant conversation? They take him by the arm and they insist upon his coming in, addressing him in the words: "Abide with us, for it is toward evening."

The candles are lighted, the table is spread, pleasant socialities are enkindled. They rejoice in the presence of the stranger guest. He asks a blessing upon the bread they eat, and he hands a piece of it to each. Suddenly and with overwhelming power the thought flashes upon the astonished people—it is the Lord! And as they sit in breathless wonder, looking upon the resurrected body of Jesus, he vanished. The interview ended. He was gone.

With many of us it is a bright, sunny day of prosperity. There is not a cloud in the sky, not a leaf rustling in the forest. No chill in the air. But we cannot expect all this to last. He is not an intelligent man who expects perpetual daylight of joy. The sun will after awhile near the horizon. The shadows will lengthen. While I speak, many of us stand in the very hour described in the text, "for it is toward evening." The request of the text is appropriate for some before me. For with them it is toward the evening of old age. They have passed the meridian of life. They are sometimes startled to think how old they are. They do not, however, like to have others remark upon it. If others suggest their approximation toward venerable appearance, they say, "Why, I'm not so old, after all." They do, indeed, notice that they cannot lift quite so much as once. They cannot walk quite so fast. They cannot read quite so well without

They have lost their taste for merriment. They are surprised at the quick passage of the year. They say that it only seems a little longer than they were boys. They are going a little down hill. There is something in their health, something in their vision, something in their walk, something in their changing associations, something above, something beneath, something within, to remind them that it is toward evening.

The great want of all such is to have Jesus abide with them. It is a dismal thing to be getting old without the rejuvenating influence of religion. When we step on the down grade of life and see that it dips to the verge of the cold river, we want to behold some one near who will help us across it. When the sight loses its power to glance and gather up, we need the faith that can illumine. When we feel the failure of the ear, we need the clear tones of that voice which in olden times broke up the silence of the deaf with cadences of mercy. When the axe-men of death hew down whole forests of strength and beauty around us and we are left in solitude, we need the dove of divine mercy to sing in our branches. When the shadows begin to fall and we feel that the day is far spent, we need most of all to supplicate the strong, beneficent Jesus in the prayer of the villagers, "Abide with us, for it is toward evening."

The request of the text is an appropriate exclamation for all those who are approached in the gloomy hour of temptation. There is nothing easier than to be good-natured when everything pleases, or to be humble when there is nothing to oppose us, or forgiving when we have not been assailed, or honest when we have no inducement to fraud. But you have felt the grapple of some temptation. Your nature at some time quaked and groaned under the infernal force. You felt that the devil was after you. You saw your Christian graces retreating. You feared that you would fall in the awful wrestle with sin and be thrown into the dust. The gloom thickened. The first indications of the night were seen in all the trembling of your soul; in all the infernal suggestions of Satan, in all the surging up of tumultuous passions and excitements, you felt with awful emphasis that it was toward evening. In the tempted hour you need to ask Jesus to abide with you. You can beat back the monster that would devour you. You can unhorse the sin that would ride you down. You can sharpen the battle-axe with which you split the head of helmeted abomination! Who helped Paul shake the brazen-gated heart of Felix? Who acted like a good sailor when all the crew howled in the Mediterranean shipwreck? Who helped the martyrs to be firm when one word of recantation would have unfastened the withes of the stake and put out the kindling fire? When the night of the soul came on and all the denizens of darkness came riding upon the winds of perdition—who gave strength to the soul? Who gave calmness to the heart? Who broke the spell of infernal enchantment? He who heard the request of the villagers, "Abide with us, for it is toward evening."

One of the forts of France was attacked and the outworks were taken before night. The besieging army lay down, thinking there was but little to do in the morning, and that the soldiery in the fort could be easily made to surrender. But during the night, through a back stairs, they escaped into the country. In the morning the besieging army sprang upon the battlements, but found that their prey was gone. So, when we are assaulted in temptation, there is always some secret stair by which we might get off. God will not allow us to be tempted above what we are able, but with every temptation will bring a way of escape that we may be able to bear it.

The prayer of the text is appropriate for all who are anticipating sorrow. The greatest folly that ever grew on this planet is the tendency to borrow trouble; but there are times when approaching sorrow is so evident that we need to be making special preparation for its coming.

One of your children has lately become a favorite. The cry of that child strikes deeper into the heart than the cry of all the others. You think more about it. You give it more attention, not because it is any more of a treasure than the others, but because it is becoming frail. There is something in the cheek, in the eye and in the walk that makes you quite sure that the leaves of the flower are going to be scattered. The utmost nursing and medical attendance are ineffectual. The pulse becomes feebler, the complexion lighter, the step weaker, the laugh fainter. No more romping for that one through hall and parlor. The nursery is darkened by an approaching calamity. The heart feels with mournful anticipation that the sun is going down. Night speeds on. It is toward evening.

You have long rejoiced in the care of a mother. You have done everything to make her last days happy. You have run with quick feet to wait upon her every want. Her presence has been a perpetual blessing in the household. But the fruit-gatherers are looking wistfully at that tree. Her soul is ripe for heaven. The gates are ready to flash open for her entrance. But your soul sinks at the thought of a separation. You cannot bear to think that soon you will be called to take the last look at that face which from the first hour has looked upon you with affection unchangeable. But you see that life is ebbing and the grave will soon hide her from your sight. You sit quiet. You feel heavy-hearted. The light is fading from the sky. The air is chill. It is toward evening.

You had a considerable estate and felt independent. In five minutes on one fair balance-sheet you could see just how you stood in the world. But there came complications. Something that you imagined impossible happened. The best friend you had proved traitor to your interests. A sudden crash of national misfortunes prostrated your credit. You may to-day be going on in business, but you feel anxious about where you are standing, and fear that the next turning of the wheel will bring you prostrate. You foresee what you consider certain defalcation. You think of the anguish of telling your friends you are not worth a dollar. You know not how you will ever bring your children home from school. You wonder how you will stand the selling of your library or the moving into a plainer house. The misfortunes of life have accumulated. You wonder what makes the sky so dark. It is toward evening.

Trouble is an apothecary that mixes a great many draughts, bitter and sour and nauseous, and you must drink some one of them. Trouble puts up a great many packs, and you must carry some one of them. There is no sandal so thick and well adjusted but some thorn will strike through it. There is no sound so sweet but the undertaker's screw-driver grates through it. In this swift shuttle of the human heart some of the threads must break. The journey from Jerusalem to Emmaus will soon be ended. Our Bible, our common-sense, our observation reiterate in tones that we cannot mistake, and ought not to disregard. It is toward evening.

Oh, then, for Jesus to abide with us. He sweetens the cup. He extracts the thorn. He wipes the tear. He hushes the tempest. He soothes the soul that flies to him for shelter. Let the light swoop and the euroclydon cross the sea. Let the thunders roar—soon all will be well. Christ in the ship to soothe his friends. Christ on the sea to stop its tumult. Christ in the grave to scatter the darkness. Christ in the heavens to lead the way. Blessed all such. His arms will enclose them, his grace comfort them, his light cheer them, his sacrifice free them, his glory enchant them. If earthly gates take wings, he will be an incorruptible treasure. If friends die, he will be their resurrection. Standing with us in the morning of our joy and in the noon of our prosperity, he will not forsake us when the lustre has faded and it is toward evening.

Listen to Paul's battle-shout with is- fortune. Hark to mounting Latinus' fire-song. Look at the glory that has left the dungeon and filled the earth and leaves with the crash of the falling manes of despotism. And then look at those who have tried to cure themselves by human prescriptions, attempting to heal gangrene with a patch of court-plaster, and to the plague of dying empires with the quackery of earthly wisdom. Nothing can speak peace to the soul. Nothing can unstrap our crushing burdens, nothing can overcome our spiritual foes, nothing can open our eyes to see the surrounding horses and chariots of salvation that fill all the mountains, but the voice and command of him who stopped one night at Emmaus.

The words of the text are pertinent to us all, from the fact that we are nearing the evening of death. I have heard it said that we ought to live as though each moment were to be our last. I do not believe that theory. As far as preparation is concerned, we ought always to be ready; but we cannot always be thinking of death for we have duties in life that demand attention. When a man is selling goods it is his business to think of the bargain he is making. When a man is pleading the courts it is his duty to think of the interests of his clients. When a clerk is adding up his accounts it is his duty to keep his mind upon the column of figures. He who fills up his life with thought of death is far from being the highest type of Christian. I knew a man who often to say at night, "I wish I might be before morning!" He became an invalid.

But there are times when we can do ought to give ourselves to the contemplation of that solemn moment when the soul time ends and eternity begins. We must go through that one pass. There is no roundabout way, no by-path, no circuitous route. Die we must; and it will be to us a shameful occurrence or a time of admirable behavior. Our friends may stretch out their hands to keep us busy, but no imprecation on their part can help us. They might offer large retainers, but death would not take the fee. The breath will fail, and the eyes will close, and the heart will stop. You may hang the cloth with gorgeous tapestry, but what does death care for beautiful curtains? You may hang the room with the finest works of art, but what does death care for pictures? You may fill the house with the wailings of widowhood and orphanage, does death mind weeping?

This ought not to be a depressing thing. Who wants to live here for ever? The world has always treated me well, and every day I feel less and less like scolding and complaining. But yet I would want to make this my eternal residence. I love to watch the clouds, and bathe my soul in the blue sea of heaven; but I expect when the firmament is rolled away a scroll to see a new heaven, grander, higher and more glorious. You ought to be willing to exchange your body that has headaches and sideaches and weaknesses innumerable, that limps with the sto, bruises, or festers with the thorn, or flares on the funeral pyre of fevers, for an incorruptible body and an eye that blinks here the jasper gates and the great white throne. But between that and this there is a long hour about which no man should be careless or foolhardy. I doubt not your courage, but I tell you that you will want something better than a strong arm, a good aim and a trusty sword when you come to your last battle. You will need a better robe than any you have in your wardrobe to keep you warm in that place. Circumstances do not make so much difference. It may be a bright day when you pull off from the planet, or it may be a dark night and while the owl is hooting from the forest. It may be Spring, and your soul may go out among the blossoms, the orchards swinging their censers in the air. It may be Winter and the earth in a snow shroud. It may be Autumn, and the forests set on fire by the retreating sun; dead nature laid out in state. It may be with your wife's hand in your hand, or you may be in a strange hotel with a servant faithful to the last. It may be in the rail train, shot off the track and tumbling in long reverberation on the embankment—crash! crash! I know not the time; I know not the mode; the days of our life are being subtracted away and we shall come down to the end when we have but ten days left, then nine days, then eight days, then seven days, six days, five days, four days, three days, two days, one day. Then hours: three hours, two hours, one hour. Then minutes left: five minutes, four minutes, three minutes, two minutes, one minute. Then only seconds left; four seconds, three seconds, two seconds, one second. Gone! The chapter of life ended! The book closed! The pulses at rest! The feet through with the journey! The lips closed from all work. No word on the lips. No breath in the nostrils. Hair bedded back to lie undisheveled by any human hands. The muscles still. The bones still. The lungs still. The tongue still. All still. You might put the stethoscope to the breast and hear no sound. You might put a speaking-trumpet to the ear but you could not wake the deafness. No motion; no throb; no life. Still! still! death comes to the disciple! What the sun of life is about to set? Jesus is the day-spring from on high; the perpetual morning of every ransomed spirit. What if the darkness comes? Jesus is the light of the world and of heaven. What though this earthly house does crumble! Jesus has prepared a house of many mansions. Jesus is the anchor that always holds. Jesus is the light that is never dimmed. Jesus is the fountain that is never exhausted. Jesus is the evening star, hung up amid the gloom of the gathering night!

You are almost through with the abuse of backbiting of enemies. They will call you no more by evil names. Your good deeds will no longer be misinterpreted nor your honor filched. The troubles of earth will end in the felicities! Toward evening! The bereavements of earth will soon be ended. You will not much longer stand weeping your grief in the tomb, like Rachel weeping for her children or David mourning Absalom. Broken hearts bound up. Wounds healed. Tears wiped away. Sorrows terminated. No more sounding of the dead march! Toward evening. Death will come, sweet as slumber to the eyelids of the babe, as full rations to a starving soldier, as evening hour to the exhausted workman. The sky will take on its sunset glow, every cloud a fire-psalm, every lake a glassy mirror; the forests transfigured; delicate mists climbing the air. Your friends will announce it; your pulses will beat it; your joys will ring it; your lips will whisper it: "Toward evening!"

A Life of Valiant Service to the Protestant Cause Closed in the Death of the Right Rev. Arthur Cleveland Cox.

LAST week a brief announcement appeared in this journal of the loss the Protestant Episcopal Church had sustained by the sudden death of the Bishop of Western New York. We now give on this page the portrait of the famous divine with some facts about his distinguished career.

Arthur Cleveland Cox came of Presbyterian parentage. His father was the Rev. Samuel Harrison Cox, pastor of the First Presbyterian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. The final letter of the Bishop's name was an addition of his own, based on his antiquarian researches. He was born at Mendham, N. J., in 1818, and had therefore attained the age of seventy-eight years when he died. He was educated at the University of New York, and early gave indications of a predilection for a ministerial career. He was, however, disinclined to follow in his father's footsteps, and in looking around for a church home he was attracted by the Protestant Episcopal Church which, to his mind, appeared to approach nearer to his idea of the primitive church of the New Testament and the early fathers than any other communion. He accordingly entered that church, was confirmed, and began his studies for the ministry in the General Theological Seminary. His first charge was at St. Ann's in New York, where the learning and eloquence of the young clergyman made a deep impression. He subsequently labored at Hartford, Conn., and Baltimore, Md. In 1863 he returned to New York to become Rector of Calvary Church. Two years were all that he was able to give to the work there, for in 1865 he was elected Bishop Coadjutor of Western New York to aid Bishop De Lancey in the arduous work of the diocese.

Three months later the death of the latter ensued and Bishop Cox succeeded him in the Episcopate. Since that time his activity has been incessant. With tongue and pen he labored indefatigably and apparently without any decrease of energy until a few weeks ago, when he suffered from nervous dyspepsia. With Mrs. Cox he went for a brief rest to Clifton Springs, N. Y., where he seemed to be regaining his normal robust health. He had so far recovered as to arrange a journey to Buffalo on Episcopal business on July 20, and was preparing to start when he was seized with severe pain, and died within a few hours.

Bishop Cox was best known by his stalwart defence of the doctrines of the Reformation, and his sturdy opposition to the party in the Church which tended in the direction of Roman Catholicism. It was his hope to eventually reach so broad a comprehension as to win to the fold the Presbyterians, Congregationalists and even the Methodists. Here and at the Conferences in England he steadily labored with this object in view, and it was largely due to his efforts that the Lambeth Conferences were held. The Revision of the Prayer Book was also suggested and advocated by him. He was strongly in sympathy with the work of Dr. Dollinger and Pere Hyacinthe, and took a prominent part in every movement that had for its object the reunion of the sects. The Bishop contributed extensively to periodical literature, and was the author of several beautiful hymns.

How College Graduates are Helping the Poor of the Great City to Bear Their Burdens.

IN several previous numbers of this journal the principle of the College and Social Settlement movement has been explained, and the working of it in New York and other cities has been described. We are now indebted to Mr. Walter V. Gulick for a picture and an account of one of the most successful of the Chicago Settlements, which bears the name of The Commons. It is under the auspices of the Chicago Theological Seminary, and is under the personal direction of one of its professors, Dr. Graham Taylor, who occupies the chair of Christian Sociology in that institution. It was the sixth of the ten Settlements of Chicago to enter the work, but its facilities and the earnestness with which the young students have labored have placed it in the forefront of them all, and have made it one of the model institutions of the kind in the world.

The Commons, of which a picture is here given, stands at the centre of one of the overcrowded river wards, near the junction of Union street with Milwaukee avenue.

There is a tradition that the house was erected some years ago by a wealthy brewer as a residence for his family, before the flight of residents to the suburbs began. It is large and roomy, and after the decadence of the neighborhood began a large frame building was erected in its rear, which became a lodging house for Italians. Both buildings are now used by the Settlement, which has thus forty-four rooms at its disposal. It seemed as if Providence had arranged the building purposely for the Settlement, so exactly is it adapted for it in arrangement and location. It affords ample accommodation for the three families and the eleven residents who have taken up their abode there, that they may minister to the poor people who swarm in the surrounding streets.

As in other Settlements, there is no charitable work carried on in The Commons. Kindly gifts there may be occasionally, as there are between neighbors and friends everywhere, but no one expects to get relief there. The people around simply know that there are some nice, neighborly, genial people living there who are hospitable and good people to know. They have friendly parties frequently, when there is good music and conversation, and when the men and women of the neighborhood are welcomed without ceremony and without condescension. It is accounted a privilege by the people who live, eat and sleep in one dark, ill-smelling room in a tenement house, to come into one of the big, clean rooms at The Commons and spend an evening pleasantly, talking and listening to singing and music. Then, too, all day long there are two rooms open in The Commons, one for men and one for boys, in which, spread on long tables are the daily and weekly papers and the monthly magazines. A man or a boy can turn in there at any time, if through unfavorable weather or any other cause he has an idle day on his hands.

But this neighborly hospitality, though the foundation work of The Commons, does not cover all that is done there. Some of the good people who live there conduct a Kindergarten School to which sixty little children come, wisely preferring it to the sidewalk and the gutter, which were formerly their only places of play and amusement. Some of the residents are medical students from the colleges, and any one who is sick can get advice free if their cases are simple, and periodically one of the ablest medical experts is there to whom they can apply without cost if their cases are too complicated for the students to treat. Then, too, there are some young ladies there from Wellesley and Vassar colleges, who are able to teach the girls of the neighborhood cooking and dressmaking, as well as talk to them on subjects of higher interest. Not lecturing, but friendly conversations, which the factory girl appreciates. She knows these college ladies as her friends, who will listen to her troubles and difficulties, and sympathize and advise her. In the evening there are all kinds of friendly gatherings. Debating clubs are very popular there, and Bible classes are well attended.

The influence of this association with cultivated people is distinctly beneficial on the neighborhood. One instance in point will serve as an illustration. A lady held a kind of reception at The Commons one afternoon, when the boys of the neighborhood came and spent an hour or two there. The meeting ended pleasantly, and all left. But shortly afterwards two came back and asked to see the lady. They explained with some difficulty that they were volunteers who had come to make an apology. One of the other boys had seen some small coin in the room at the reception, and his habits and bringing up had caused him to yield to temptation. He did not know the code of honor existing as to The Commons, and he had stolen the money. But outside, conscience pricked him, and the thing becoming known it was decreed that nothing would meet the case but prompt restitution. But the boy was too much ashamed to come himself, and, besides, there was a doubt about his trustworthiness. These two boys volunteered to carry back the stolen money. The lady asked them how it was they were trusted. They explained that they were subjected to a plan that would have done credit to a first-class detective. They were deprived of all money and their pockets emptied. Then the stolen money was given to them, and when they came out their companions searched them to see that there was no coin in their possession. This way of providing for the fidelity of a messenger would not have occurred to boys of less mental capacity, or of less experience in the tortuous ways of low city life. It showed how sorely needed was some such refining influence as The Commons exerts, and the voluntary restitution showed that the influence is being felt. Many stories are told of the same character, indicating the beneficial nature of the results on men and women, as well as on boys. There is no direct reformatory or philanthropic effort but the neighborly and friendly interest is doing its work.
